Literally Swiss
Swiss literature is rich — in variety, in quality and, of course, in the diversity of the languages it is written in.

It is this richness that we want to represent and celebrate in this edition of The Riveter, giving space to literature written in all of Switzerland’s official languages. In pursuit of this aim, we have enlisted the views of experts in Swiss writing. Translator Jamie Bulloch ponders literature written in the country’s biggest language, Swiss German, while crime writer Nicolas Verdan discusses the current state of Swiss-French writing. We also have Professor Alan Robinson examining the relationships between Swiss-French and Swiss-German literature and that written in France and Germany. In terms of the smaller languages, poet Vanni Biaconi offers a view on the state of Swiss-Italian writing, and Professor in Romansh, Rico Franc Valär, offers an overview of writing in the various forms of that language.

We’re honoured to have extracts from work published in English by eminent Swiss writers from all backgrounds: Monique Schwitter, Michelle Steinbeck, Nicolas Verdan, Pedro Lenz and Arno Camenisch. More treats are in store in the form of extracts from writing yet to find an English publisher, among them work by Michael Fehr, Elisa Shua Dusapin, Aude Seigne and Jens Nielsen.

We have poetry too, from the great Nora Gomringer, Leta Semadeni, Pierre Voélin and Fabio Pusterla.

Yet more writers provide interesting views on aspects of Swiss culture: Melinda Nadj Abonji writes about the immigrant experience in Switzerland; Xiaolu Guo shares her thoughts on the Swiss book everyone knows — Heidi — and the quintessential British-Swiss writer Alain de Botton discusses Zurich.

And, as always in The Riveter, we offer you some Riveting Reviews — views from talented critics on Swiss books in English that you can find in bookstores now.

This feast of Swiss literature is headed up by a world exclusive: an extract from the new novel – not published in English until autumn 2019 – by Peter Stamm. Our thanks to the author, his translator and publisher for allowing us to give you this very special piece.

Thanks indeed to all our contributors – the authors, translators and publishers, the reviewers and writers, the cover designer, Amélie Keller, and to both the Swiss and English Arts Councils, whose support has made this magazine possible.

West Camel is a writer, editor and reviewer. He is the Editor of The Riveter magazine. His debut novel, Attend is published in December 2018.
How would you describe Swiss literature?

Since I started working with the Swiss Arts Council, Pro Helvetia in 2012, first on their annual book trade magazine 12 Swiss Books and then on our new Literally Swiss project, I’ve been asked this question many times – and I still don’t know the answer. The question is tough even for Swiss writers and book trade professionals. Ask ten people and you get ten different answers. Our Swiss Riveter magazine will surely help: there are thoughtful essays on this very topic and an impressive range of writing as well as excerpts in all genres and from all languages.

So, how would you describe Swiss literature? When you ask, you are immediately drawn into a discussion about Switzerland itself and issues of Swiss identity, mentality, geography and language. Is it writing about lakes, mountains and skiing? About cuckoo clocks, fondue and chocolate? Is Swiss literature simply embodied by those who write it, such as Jacques Chessex, Giorgio Orelli, Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Robert Walser, Johanna Spyri or Max Frisch? Max Frisch himself said that a Swiss writer was a ‘citizen of the world’, cosmopolitan, multicultural and multilingual. These are indeed precious attributes, but equally the Swiss can be seen as insular and private, dependent on the vitality of incomers. It’s clear that geography is destiny when you live in a landlocked, hybrid nation, an island in the centre of Europe, and one of the most breathtakingly beautiful countries in Europe. Surely natural beauty inspires great writing? Friedrich Nietzsche, the German philosopher, lived in Switzerland for many years, was a keen mountain climber and wrote several of his great works here. Content is king in Swiss writing. Its writers are informed. They know their villages, mountains, lakes and alps. They know about banking and corruption; about their architecture, design and environment; their unique political system, neutrality and referendums. A Swiss writer may not always live in Switzerland (cf. Alain de Botton) but they know their country and will often be drawn back home.

Swiss writers often maintain that they have more in common with their German, French or Italian neighbours, and may feel they have succeeded only if they are published outside Switzerland. One of my favourite Swiss writers, Peter Stamm, who writes in German, was snapped up by a leading publisher in Germany. This November, Peter won the Swiss Book Prize, which is, however, only awarded to Swiss writers in German. So, does that make him the best Swiss writer or simply the best Swiss-German writer? Decide for yourselves, as we are honoured to publish an exclusive English excerpt from his prizewinning novel, The Gentle Indifference of the World, translated by Michael Hoffman. I’ve read it in German and it’s another Stamm-stunner: a crime novel, love story and psychodrama about the mystery of life.

I’m lucky enough to speak three of the Swiss languages, German, French and Italian, and, like the majority of Swiss, I enjoy hopping about linguistically, enjoying the different cities, regions and cultures of Switzerland. Each region has its own literature prizes and festivals, its own linguistic quirks and literary genres. Meeting Arno Camenisch and Pedro Lenz this year has been an education in the joys of Swiss dialect. You can read their work in this magazine. Live performances by Swiss poets and storytellers Nora Gomringer and Michael Fehr have also blown me away. I can’t wait for you to meet them in the UK. Because that is another, sadder, aspect of Swiss literature: it is not well known outside Switzerland.

Now I’m going to stick my neck out: of all the European literatures I am reading these days, Swiss literature is the most original, varied and exciting. There’s a lively performance and spoken-word culture – especially among dialect writers. Villages, cities and mountains are alive with the sound of literature. In June I attended a Swiss book festival in the mountain resort of Leukerbad where events took place in a spa!

Swiss literature is an exciting mix of youthful innovation and celebrated classics. Being at ease with different languages makes it more inventive. As you’ll read in our magazine, its diversity has been boosted enormously by immigration. Today Swiss writers are not writing only in the four official languages but also in the languages of immigration. Nicolas Verdan is originally Greek; Melinda Nadj Abonji from Yugoslavia. There are not enough translators and definitely not enough being translated into English.

We’re here to help. That’s what Literally Swiss does.
When I was a child, I adored Heidi, the fictional girl who lived in the Swiss Alps. I became aware of Switzerland for the first time, although a night spent on a Swiss mountain in our family car, surrounded by cows with loud bells, is also unforgettable, as was my first taste of Swiss chocolate. This year I made a very rash promise, that there would always be chocolate at my Literally Swiss events. Heidi and chocolate are, of course, things any country could be proud of, but if you’re appalled by my liberal use of clichés so far, fear not, as my mission with Literally Swiss is to smash the stereotypes and introduce you to the Best of Swissness. A year ago, I was asked by Pro Helvetia in Zurich to help them promote Swiss literature and translation in the UK and increase its visibility. Literally Swiss was born at The Tabernacle arts centre in London with a host of outstanding Swiss authors: Alain de Botton, Monique Schwitter, Nicolas Verdan, Pedro Lenz and Peter Stamm. Along with my Literally Swiss colleagues, Amber Massie-Blomfield, Anna Blasiak, Nikki Mander and West Camel, we’re here to help writers, publishers, agents, translators, cultural institutes, arts organisations, media, festival directors and event programmers interested in developing Swiss projects for 2018 and beyond. The Swiss Riveter is a labour of great love for Switzerland. When you’ve read it, do tell me how you would describe Swiss literature!

The professor’s seminar seemed to enjoy considerable popularity, it was held in a large lecture hall. When I stepped in, there were already at least forty students sitting on the benches; just like in my day, more women than men. While the professor gave a brief introduction, I looked around and suddenly saw him, the night-porter, the younger version of myself. He was sitting by the aisle most of the way back and was holding a plastic cup that he sipped out of from time to time. The sight of him so utterly disoriented me that I no longer heard what the professor was saying. Only when there was an expectant silence did I realise he must have finished and given me the floor. I got a grip on myself and started on my talk, in which I compared writing to the search for a path in an unfamiliar landscape, and posited the difference between the private and the autobiographical. There were questions afterwards. The young man from my village seemed to have been paying close attention, each time I looked up at him our eyes would meet, and I quickly looked away, as though he might otherwise recognise me and give me away. He didn’t ask a question, just made occasional notes in a small notebook that he tucked away in his pocket each time. After the bell rang, the professor said a few words by way of conclusion and reminded those present of the author who was due the following week. I wasn’t surprised that my double was one of the first to leave the lecture theatre, with hurried steps, as though he had another class to go to. I had half a mind to follow him, but a few students ringed me with books to sign, one young woman asked me for a piece for the student magazine, and another wanted advice in finding a publisher. By the time everyone went away satisfied, the young man was long gone. I asked the professor if he knew him. Brown hair like mine, a plastic coffee cup in his hand, sixth or seventh row, far left. He couldn’t place him. Probably a freshman, he said, they come and go, I can’t possibly know them all.

The following week, I visited the German department again, waiting in the hallway for the seminar to finish. No sooner had the bell gone this time than there was my double running down the steps. I followed him out of the building and along the street. He only had a sweater on top, even though it was cool and rainy. He headed in the direction of the lake, turned off at the theatre, and zigzagged through the lanes of the old town to an old-fashioned café I had often patronised myself in my time as a student.

The place was almost empty. I sat down at a table behind him. The waitress took his order, a toasted sandwich and a small beer. I’ll have the same, I said, when she approached. She looked at me in bewilderment, and I repeated his order. He didn’t seem to hear, because he had taken down a newspaper from a rack by the door and was leafing through it. I went and helped myself to one as well, but I couldn’t concentrate on any of the articles because I kept squinting across to him.

THE YIN AND YANG OF HEIDI
BY XIAOLU GUO

Growing up in a Communist house in 1970s and 1980s China, I never encountered any children’s books. Fairy tales were not encouraged in China at that time. Instead we were fed heroic stories about Communist revolutionaries. A seven-year-old child would be taught at school to defend his country against the American imperialists.

I was already sixteen when I first read a children’s story – it was Hans Christian Andersen’s Little Mermaid. At that time I was still living in southern China with my Communist parents. I was terribly affected by this beautiful story. I loved it intensely. My heart was broken when I read that the little mermaid had to cut off her tail in order to become a woman and gain the love of the prince. It presented me with a very different world – the one the Chinese government wasn’t interested in showing. It showed me that the human world is a seductive but cruel and painful place. Not only did the little mermaid have to dance for the prince on her bleeding feet, he also abandoned her and married another girl – a supposed princess. When I read the ending, in which the little mermaid dies and her body dissolves into foam, I was in tears.

I remember walking alongside the fields of blooming rapeseed on my way from home to school. I was soaked in a deep sense of melancholy. Love and adulthood are brutal, I thought. No wonder my parents and my school kept telling us not to fall in love yet, certainly not when we were still young; if we did, our future would be totally ruined.

Obviously I was under the influence of Communist ideology then: personal love was not a great thing to pursue when there was a greater love – the love for your country and for your people.

Years passed. I left my small Chinese village for Beijing to study art. Then I left China for the West. After I left steamy southern China, I lived in many countries, working on novels and making films. Still, I didn’t have any interest in children’s books – I thought that I had long passed that age and it belonged to a past that never was. Then all of sudden, I found myself turning forty, an age that presages great changes for a woman. I realised that I was no longer that young Communist punk. And then, not long after I was forty, I gave birth, in London, to my first child. How incredible! I thought to myself: I’ve been a militant feminist for so many years and now I have become the mother of a girl! As I carried the little child in my sling, I entered a bookshop and bought a few picture books, including a copy of Heidi, which I had never read before. This event was followed by another coincidence. A day after I bought the beautifully illustrated Heidi, I received a letter from the Literature House in Zurich, inviting me to be their writer in residence for six months.

I was happy to accept this invitation. I looked at the brand-new copy of the book about Heidi I had just bought and I thought: this is perfect. Now I would be able to learn what Heidi’s world was like – Switzerland and the Alps, childhood and motherhood! I would start to learn new things, like a little baby; like my own daughter, Moon.

So I left London for Zurich with my little one and my partner, and with Heidi in my suitcase. We were stunned by the peace and beauty of the city. Our house was very close to Zuriberg, a hill covered in pine forest – a very un-urban environment compared to Beijing or London. In the evening, in our apartment on Hegibachstrasse, I began to read Heidi to my child:

‘The little old town of Mayenfeld is charmingly situated. From it a footpath leads through green, well-wooded stretches to the foot of the heights which look down imposingly upon the valley...’

Chinese people, when we think about Switzerland, think of something opposite to Chinese society. Switzerland is apolitical, democratic and multilingual, with pristine mountains and clean rivers, and the highest standard of living. China is everything but these things. After we arrived here, we travelled around the country, from the German part to the French part. And it seemed to me obvious that, besides its wealth, Switzerland is one of the most beautiful countries on Earth. Here money hasn’t ruined nature. On the contrary, money has protected nature – something China is not able to achieve at the moment. I also found the system of four-languages-in-one-country fascinating, given that I have come from a monolingual culture. Yes, the grass on the other side is always greener.

So far, I hadn’t encountered much of the negative side of Swiss culture, which the cliché says is inward, conservative and sometimes dull. But even if there were some truth in those clichés, I asked myself, what mountain people in this world would be fast and modern? People living on the Himalayas or the Andes? The Swiss I have met (playwrights, scientists, psychologists and architects) are bright and self-critical people. They seem to be very aware of their blessed living conditions. Perhaps that’s why they are a bit apologetic when they are with foreigners. I didn't meet a banker in Switzerland; perhaps most of the bankers had gone to London or New York to do business? During my residency, we visited Bern, Basel, Luzern, Lausanne and Geneva. In one of those hotel rooms in the mountains, I contemplated the grand vista of nature around me and wondered about the time of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Thomas Mann and Hermann Hesse. I thought that their philosophical life must have been shaped and influenced by those snow-capped mountains and fast-flowing rivers; as the Chinese would say: 'kind men love mountains and wise men prefer water'. Men search for their own type of harmony.

After I finished reading Heidi to my child, I watched two film versions of the book. I imagined myself as an orphan growing up in the Alps. But I couldn’t picture myself being happy on those mountains – I would be afraid of the bad-tempered grandfather, and I would surely feel very lonely without people around. But maybe that’s because I was never a Swiss girl. Perhaps a Swiss girl doesn’t see peacefulness as loneliness, because she doesn’t grow up in a populated, busy and ever-changing urban world. Then I thought about my adopted country – Britain. Britain is a country with working-class kids fighting on its mean streets, which are stained by rain and littered by rubbish. Being an English orphan is surely very different from being a Swiss one. Oliver Twist in urban, industrial England had to work as a child labourer and young thief to fill his stomach. There were no flowers or cute animals in that grey and polluted factoryland. There were only beggars, capitalists and policemen.

In Zurich, almost every day, we walked down to the lake and swam there. I was never inclined to sports. But perhaps because I knew that we would never be able to live in this expensive city if we were not invited by the Literature House, I decided to appreciate the place. On one of our walking tours, led by locals, I learned that Vladimir Lenin had been exiled in Zurich during WWI before he undertook the October Revolution. As I walked around the narrow, cobbled streets in the old town of Zurich, I imagined the famous Russian revolutionary writing his April Thesis, his future plan for the Bolshevik Party and a new government. I pictured him working in one of these brightly lit cafés, quiet, elegant, devoid of political atmosphere – an environment opposite to Russia then. And here I was, in a softly lit café in central Zurich. I was writing my memoir – a book about my poverty-ridden childhood in rural China under the yoke of Communist dogma.

We are no longer in Heidi’s time. The modern-day Heidi would be sent to a school downtown (probably studying Chinese as her second language). It’s incredible to think that only 150 years ago most people were still living in rural areas and undertaking real travel with their own feet or carts.
Since the invention of commercial air travel in the US in 1914, the world has changed radically. Now we are on a totally different planet: fast, urbanised, technical and global.

The day before we left Switzerland, I climbed the Alps with my Swiss friends. At one point, I found myself breathing heavily, standing in the deep snow on a 3,000-metre-high mountaintop. We were on Titlis, near Engelberg, with a panoramic, yet empty view beneath us. The scenery was almost too spiritual for a Chinese woman like me, who had grown up in hot, muddy rice paddies swamped by mosquitoes and human activity. I gazed down at the unspoiled slope under some cliffs, wondering if I could survive on a Swiss mountain – cutting off all connections to the culture I grew up in. Then I heard a string of clicking camera sounds. I turned around in the thin air, discovering that I was surrounded by armies of Chinese tourists. But none of them had climbed the mountain with their own feet. They had taken the ski lift. Some of them even wore flip-flops! They stood on the top for about eight to ten minutes, just enough time to take some photos. Then they collectively disappeared down the hill via the ski lift again. I presumed that their Chinese lunch was ready in the local Chinese restaurant in Engelberg – named ‘Moon Rise’ – which I had also visited. Seeing my fellow Chinese natives leave the mountain for their spicy pork noodle lunch, I lost my intention to have a spiritual conversation with solemn nature and silent snow. I was keen to get back to Earth. On the way down to the village, the sentences from Heidi began to ring in my ears:

‘They started merrily up the Alp. A cloudless, deep-blue sky looked down on them, for the wind had driven away every little cloud in the night. The fresh green mountainside was bathed in brilliant sunlight, and many blue and yellow flowers had opened. Heidi was wild with joy...’

As we descended, I wondered: do we spend enough time looking at what lies around us on our planet? Don’t we owe a big debt to nature? It seemed to me that our modern life has driven us further and further away from the source of everything. We consumers only consume nature, and nature doesn’t want us and doesn’t really need us. There will be no more Heidis in this world, there to appreciate the contours of nature with wild joy.

Xiaolu Guo was born in south China. She studied film at the Beijing Film Academy and published six books in China before she moved to London in 2002. She has lived and worked all over Europe, including Switzerland, where she also teaches. In 2013 she was named as one of Granta’s Best of Young British Novelists. Xiaolu has also directed several award-winning films.
I have a long-standing affection for Swiss literature. Like many A-level students over the years, my first taste of literature in German was through the dramas of Frisch and Dürrenmatt. I revisited Swiss drama as an undergraduate, met my future wife acting in a Dürrenmatt play, then wound up teaching Die Physiker (‘The Physicists’) to A-level students during my brief spell as a schoolmaster.

What is the enduring appeal of these two giants of Swiss letters that ensures their place on the school/university syllabus? One answer lies in the accessibility of their language. By its very nature, dialogue is easier to grapple with in a foreign language than the complex syntax of dense prose. But I have always suspected that something else is at play here too; something that has its roots in the linguistic idiosyncrasies of German-speaking Switzerland. Many a visitor to that part of the world, native German speakers included, has scratched their head at a vernacular that appears to bear no relation to the language spoken in Hamburg, Berlin or even Munich. The unintelligibility is exacerbated by the fact that dialects differ from region to region, and even valley to valley.

By contrast, the literary Swiss-German language is for the most part standardised and is indistinguishable from High German; even dialogue is washed of its dialectal colour. I may be overstating a point here, but it seems to me that when Swiss Germans write they use a language that, strictly speaking, is not their mother tongue. I believe this affords their writing a particular clarity, which enhances their accessibility to foreign readers, a hypothesis certainly borne out by my experience of translating Richard Weihe, Martin Suter and Peter Beck.

Another feature of Swiss-German literature I have encountered – and one its writers share with their Austrian counterparts – also relates to accessibility. According to population statistics there are around 4.5 million Swiss Germans, just under nine million Austrians, but more than eighty million Germans. It is natural, therefore (and makes financial sense), for Swiss-German writers to aim beyond their domestic audience in an attempt to appeal to the wider German-language readership. To achieve this it helps if the content is outward-looking rather than parochial; and there can be no doubt that the two major writers I began this article with are masters at tackling issues – political, philosophical and psychological – with universal resonance.

In a similar vein, many Swiss-German writers lend their work a distinctly international flavour. An obvious example here is Pascale Mercier’s Nachtwag Nach Lissabon (‘Night Train to Lisbon’), made famous by the 2013 film adaptation; but more recently I have read Jonas Lüscher’s Kraft (‘Kraft’, set chiefly in California) and Urs Mannheim’s Bergsteigen im Flachland (‘Mountaineering in the Lowlands’) which jumps all around Europe. Not to mention Lukas Bärfuss’s Koala (‘Koala’), which looks at the Aboriginals of Australia, or his Hundert Tage (‘One Hundred Days’ – reviewed in this magazine), about the genocide in Rwanda. Is this a conscious effort by such writers, or does it proceed naturally from a country with a global outlook and outreach, home to countless international organisations?

All three of the Swiss writers I have translated fit this pattern too. Richard Weihe’s micro-epic, Sea of Ink, considers the life and art of the seventeenth-century Chinese painter, Bada Shanren. Peter Beck’s thriller Damnation (also reviewed in this magazine) has a James Bond-type hero as its protagonist, who, in true 007 style, travels to Egypt, New England and Norway to solve the crime. Two of the Martin Suter novels I’ve worked on have strong connections to Asia, in particular Sri Lanka, while the third has a brief cameo in Thailand, and otherwise centres on a Swiss banking conspiracy, but one with a worldwide dimension.

The stylistic and thematic accessibility of Swiss-German literature undoubtedly gives it a broad appeal. Which makes it particularly ripe for translation.

As fast as a person walks

When you suddenly google your first love, it’s in response to the sound of knocking you hear just before you fall asleep and hear even louder the moment you look in the mirror in the morning and catch sight of the deep vertical crease between your eyebrows. You’ve tried, in vain, to locate the source of the knocking; it seemed to come now from inside, now from outside – up in the attic / inside your skull – but you could never pin it down. The knocking comes more and more frequently, ever more inexplicably, and here it is again, this late Friday evening in January. As always, after a week in nursery school, the children were exhausted and overwrought; through the entire early evening they’d either been arguing or crying and later, when it was time for bed, they screamed like lunatics. They’re finally asleep and for a moment it’s completely quiet; even the dog is lying motionless on her blanket under my desk. I stare at her black fur until I can see her ribcage rise and fall. I breathe a sigh of relief and the knocking sets in, loud. Short, sharp hammer blows at first, which then alternate with longer blows. I draw dots and dashes in my notebook. Not that I know much about Morse code, but I study the chart until I can make out something halfway sensible. Halfway. SMOKE. TIME. KID. Well. (The alternatives were EUMOR. NATE. TEDD or IAOGN. TITN. NDNE. I don’t know of any language in which those would make the slightest sense, and so I settle for smoke, time, kid.) Silence. My husband, I assume, is busy in his room working his way through the week’s emails, something he does every Friday evening before calling out weekend! just before midnight. For a long time now, we’ve been planning on doing something together again. Anything. Sometimes he has no time, sometimes I don’t. Smoketimekid! flits through my mind. I snap my notebook shut, and on the computer, open a new window. In the search box I type Petrus, the name of my first love.

I’m prepared not to find a single thing and to give up, resigned. I’m also ready for references to a wife and kids. Why shouldn’t he have started a family by now? I am even prepared for photographs. But not for this. Not this. Still, Petrus had alluded to it on the first night we met. He had talked of flying, something humans can’t do and how profoundly sad that made him. He started talking about falling and then quite suddenly changed the subject to walking; and because I asked: Walking? he added: Just one step, one single step into the void and it’s all good. He spread his arms as if he wanted to fly, looked at me and smiled.

My husband walks into the room. Without knocking or saying my name. This rarely happens, only when we’re fighting, when he’s really angry, in a rage or completely beside himself. Are you busy? he asks. No, I say and swallow the rest: I just learned about Petrus’s death.

You’re out of breath, he says.

Yes, I – I have no idea why, I’m just sitting here.

Maybe that’s the reason.

He hesitates. He looks like he wants to say something. He takes a breath, looks away quickly and listens for something, for what, I have no idea. He starts to pull the door shut behind him.

Did you want something? I ask, but he answers, nothing that can’t wait. He closes the door.

When I first read Michelle Steinbeck’s novella I was thrilled and energised by its strangeness. I didn’t question the weird logic of the book for a second, in fact I welcomed it and gobbled it up like a toxic-coloured medicine. It’s rare to find a book that disorientates you so successively and totally, where surprises and shocks are around every corner, and where corners suddenly become portals, or doorways, or tombs. You know from the outset that this book will be taking you on a journey like none you’ve ever experienced before, and that the usual rules of plot, narrative and even reality don’t apply. At the base of the book, and what I suppose drew me to it, is arguably a kind of disturbing fairy tale, with its strange beasts, fathers, old crones, instances of animorphism and mistreated children. But it also reminded me of the films and stories of my childhood, such as Labyrinth, The Never-Ending Story, Alice in Wonderland and The Wizard of Oz; stories where heroines and heroes must take an odd and perplexing journey in order to ultimately find themselves and come to conclusions that were there all along but hidden in their dreams and unconscious. The extract I’ve chosen is the opening to Chapter 3, where Loribeth, carrying a suitcase containing a (possibly) dead child, meets her object of lust, The Fair Man...

The Fair Man

The road is lined with chestnut trees and never seems to end. I sit on the curb and wheeze. Maybe I could eat a bit of the kid, just a little finger, to stave off the hunger. I open the suitcase and immediately close it again. Then I yank up a tuft of grass from the edge of the street and gnaw on it. I lie on my back and look up at the sky. It’s completely yellow.

Three grey Great Danes, big as calves, come walking down the street. They’re nipping at each other’s tails and snapping at motes and mites floating on the air. I duck down in the dusty grass, but the thinnest dog has already found me. It leaps straight at me. I want to get up and flee, but it’s already pinning me down so I can’t move. It rubs its rump around on my stomach and legs and pants at me from above. The dogs flap their flews and let the threads of drool swing like hammocks from the limp folds of skin. The largest dog dances around the suitcase, pauses for a moment, sniffs. Then it pushes up the lid with its nose. It looks inside and shakes itself so that its ears slap against its throat and skull. It eyes the kid in delight, noses and rummages around in the suitcase, and bites off one of the kid’s ears.

Hey, I shout, hey –

Shut your face, snaps the dog on my stomach and bats at my face with its paws. The ear falls out of the leader’s mouth, it gives a barking laugh. Then it snaps it back up and gulps it down in one. It burps, the dog on my stomach howls, and all three of them laugh so much that their coats quiver over their bones. They can’t pull themselves together, until they finally let me go and, still chuckling, and with their ears flying behind them, run off.

I sit up. A stream of people is coming up the road. I snap the suitcase shut, pat down my clothes, and watch them. More and more people step out from between the trees and into the road. They’re wearing white robes with lace collars; the girls have wreaths of flowers in their hair and sandals with frilly socks on their feet. I join them. Snippets from a brass band float through the air, along with the scent of freshly mowed meadow and meatloaf.

The procession ends in front of a farmhouse. Clucking hens stalk around the yard, a calf with bulging eyes drinks from a trough. Red geraniums beckon from the window boxes. A girl is talking with a small, black pig.

The people gather in the front yard and whisper to each other. Standing in the doorway is a hulking woman with thick plaits looped around her ears. She’s swinging a cowbell with both hands, and her plaits bounce plumply like smoked sausages. You have to get past her if you want to go in. She looks very strict, and the bell is very loud. The people are scraping their feet and plucking at each other’s white collars. Some muster up enough courage to step forward and scream something in her ear. She drives away most of them with the bell, she lets in a few. That’s when I catch a glimpse into the hall: there they are, at a great table, all eating cake. Flowers float in water glasses on the table. The children are crumbling up the cake and dunking pieces in the flower water, the elders fish them back out again. Some wolf down their cake in three big bites. They guzzle it down with cider. It runs out of their mouths straight onto their plates and when they laugh it sprays into the yellow faces of the flowers.

I sit on the suitcase and run my finger over the cracks in the leather, then suddenly there’s a bang against the suitcase wall from the inside! I jump up and see the suitcase bulging out on one side. There’s a terrible rasping sound, as if the kid is trying to roll over. I knock the suitcase over onto the ground and give both sides a firm kick.

Need some help?
A young man is blocking out the sun. I don’t react, and stare stiffly and silently past him, so he shrugs his shoulders and turns towards the entrance, where the woman has just stopped ringing the bell. I subtly eye up his back, it is a nice back, you can see his muscles. A path of light blonde hair grows up the nape of his neck out of his shirt and leads up to curly locks that twine together like young serpents.

The young man abruptly turns and says: Looks like a good time. Bright blonde hair sticks out of his chin. Does it hurt when the stiff hair grows? I used to wonder the same thing about my father. The young man makes use of two large, pale fish eyes. And there is a kink in his chin, I don’t like that at all. He leans in towards me.

Are you hungry?
Yes, bloody starving, I say.
He looks astonished and laughs. His grin looks stupid and sugar sweet, as if cut right across his face with a knife. And he has chewing gum teeth, like a clay figurine.

Liver cake, trout cake, sweet cake?
Trout cake, I say, I want trout cake.
The young man nods and trots off to get the cake, I root around in my coat pockets. I find the cigarettes, light one up – almost very elegantly – and sit on the suitcase. I smile into the sun and think about the veins in the hand he had placed on my arm.

You smoke?
The young man is proffering a trout cake. You smoke! he says. I don’t like that at all.
Yes, I say, leering at his biceps, it’s a way of life, smoking.

Michelle Steinbeck
Translated by Jen Calleja

Michelle Steinbeck has already made a big name for herself in Switzerland as a writer of prose, poetry and drama. She is a scintillating performer and widely published. Her first stunning, surreal novel, short-listed for the Swiss Book Prize, has just been translated into English by Jen Calleja: My Father was a Man on Land and a Whale in Water.

Jen Calleja is a writer and literary translator from German. She has translated works by Wim Wenders, Gregor Hens, Kerstin Hensel, Michelle Steinbeck and Marion Poschmann. She writes a column on literary translation for the Brixton Review of Books and she was the inaugural Translator-in-Residence at the British Library 2017-2018.
The cover describes Michelle Steinbeck’s debut novel as a Freudian fairy tale in ‘absurdist prose fluctuating between panic and the comical’. Thank goodness for helpful cover quotes, otherwise I might not have got past the first page of this strange book. I’m glad I did. It’s fresh, funny and disturbing, a terrifying coming-of-age novel and a picture of hell, channelling Hieronymous Bosch and the magical, shiny brilliance of Angela Carter.

Our first-person narrator, Loribeth (Lori), is wading through nightmares on a journey across land and water, with a heavy suitcase. Inside the suitcase is a dead child. Lori meets an old soothsayer in a cemetery stroking a furry lizard, who tells her she must find her estranged father, ‘a man of letters, who writes books’, who is the owner of the suitcase. ‘The father stands in your way, he’s blocking the lucky cards. The highest Fortune card is there, and the Triumph card too! Give the father back his suitcase and you shall be showered with love, fame and gold.’

Poor Lori carting around her suitcase, her head full of horrors. But this is clearly a journey she has to undertake. There are paths and goals, arrivals and departures, decisions and meetings with significant people. As readers we suspect that there is meaning to all this, that struggle is good, battles must be won, obstacles overcome, dragons slayed. It is a highly moralistic tale, psychologically profound and youthfully idealistic.

Such a slim volume and so densely packed with crows, old men with stumps, burning houses, Lori’s constant hunger, markets selling ears and mountains of teeth. And a sense of wonder at Michelle Steinbeck’s ideas and writing, all in the pacey present tense. She loves language and invention but roots her story in enough reality for us to recognise ourselves. Brava Jen Calleja for her sharp translation of complex ideas and juxtapositions. Rendering these and the inside of Lori’s disturbed mind can’t have been easy.

There’s hope as Lori flirts on board ship with a man with spindly legs and red shorts. They discuss the child they might have in the future, although she loathes children. But no, it’s not meant to be; he’s not the one she is searching for. She shuts the suitcase with the rotting child inside and moves on. The ship is caught in a storm and we are soothed with maritime quotes.

Lori meets her father on ‘the island of fleeting fathers’, and the prose changes, becoming more expansive and sedate, calmly exploring the father-daughter relationship. As characters become older and settle down, the prose settles too. But settles into what? All her life Lori has tried to escape dullness and dreariness: ’I always want to be somewhere else, never the place where I am. But what good is going somewhere else? I always take myself with me.’

Lori is a restless, demanding narrator in her quest for the meaning of her life. She wants sunshine and happiness, without responsibility or attachments, but at a cost.

This is one of the most audacious, exuberant and thrilling novels I’ve read for a long time, even if it is disturbing and bizarre. It is a modernist, magical mash-up about families, home, identity and, ultimately, happiness.

Every moment, every encounter, every piece of dialogue in this short, intense book is packed with meaning. Ostensibly The Dead relates how the paths of its two protagonists – a Swiss film director and a Japanese government official – cross in 1930s Tokyo. But through allusion, through apparently minor detail that turns out to have major symbolic power, and through an almost Woolfian narrative technique, this short novel manages to discuss universal ideas about existence and our relationships with both our past and our future.

The moment Emil Nägeli (the director) and Masahiko Amakasu (the official) first meet is the perfect example of Kracht’s densely packed prose (expertly rendered by translator, Daniel Bowles):

‘Amakasu and Nägeli have sniffed each other out in a dream anamnestically … and assured themselves of the other’s true being … The dead are profoundly lonesome creatures … they are born alone, die and are reborn alone as well.’

In some ways, these two could be seen to represent the encounter between Germany and Japan in the run-up to WWII. Nägeli has been commissioned by the German government to make a film in Japan – a piece of propaganda that will establish Nazi supremacy on the world stage. Amakasu – who, on one level is almost a caricature of the nationalistic, single-minded, brutal Japanese – is committed to the expansion of the Empire, and is keen to manipulate the Swiss stooge the Germans have sent him.

But Kracht offers something far more complex than a simple personification of a political situation. ‘Anamnestically’ (I had to look it up) refers to the immune system’s response to a previously encountered antigen. When Nägeli and Amakasu meet, each instantly recognises himself in the other and raises his defences. Yes, this moment does refer to the encounter between Nazism and...
Japanese nationalism, but it also represents how we as individuals acknowledge and are threatened by each other’s mortality because it reminds us of our own. This moment goes even further than that, however. It explores our immortality too: how, through our very act of being – of having existed – we are eternal. As Amakasu thinks, when it seems his life is over, ‘The whole matter has something tremendously clear about it, and ridiculous, too; he doesn’t want to die, nor is he not dead.’

This complex idea is referred to throughout The Dead: walking in Tokyo, Nägeli ‘pauses before an almost bare cherry tree ... A cherry blossom falls in death, dies in falling. It is perfect like this.’ In its mortality the blossom attains immortal perfection.

In a dream, Ida, Nägeli’s fiancée, ‘somewhat timidly enters the realm of the dead ... that world-in-between where dream, film, and memory haunt one another’.

This could be a perfect description of this novel. Both Nägeli and Amakasu are haunted by memories of their past – their childhoods have shaped them, as all our childhoods have. Kracht seems to intimate something more sophisticated though: that we all continually move between our external existence – our everyday activities, thoughts and opinions – and the dream of our interior lives, which is shaped by memory, visions of the past and future, and something ineffable: maybe God; maybe ‘the primal sound of this planet’ that Amakasu hears on the point of his demise.

Certainly, this is a novel about fascism – the political, social and historical conditions in which it arose, and in which it might be ‘reborn’ – but it is also a brave and profound engagement with the nature of being.

West Camel

Christian Kracht is a Swiss novelist whose books have been translated into thirty languages. His latest novel, The Dead, was the recipient of the Hermann Hesse Literature Prize and the Swiss Book Prize.
‘In the past, right-wing extremists used to rob banks; these days they speculate and manipulate stock market prices. It’s more profitable.’

When Peter Beck originally wrote Damnation – in 2013 – he was a newcomer on the thriller scene and, to a point, this shows: Tom Winter is a bank security chief, but otherwise something of a sprig off the James Bond genome, a man trained to use violence, who does so with gusto, and who’s also capable of superhuman feats. Hanging off the runner of a helicopter while being shot at by a very nasty thug (but then they all are, aren’t they?) is just one of the many exploits that come his way, along with the regulation dishy female sidekick: they’re thrown together by circumstance, of course, not choice. The sex thankfully takes place off the page and leads to regret rather than a rosy sunset – Winter is at least more interested in love than pure libido.

Here the similarities end. This is an original, very Swiss, white-knuckle ride of a story, as high-powered as the bankers and investors who pepper its pages; the core of the plot is the worldwide race to invest in infrastructure, in this case electricity, for Egypt’s burgeoning economy. Nuclear power, Arab oil money, organised cybercrime and outright terrorism make for an explosive mix – literally (and a major problem for the reader trying to find time for that restorative cuppa). Unputdownable!

Bankers don’t like anything that disturbs their image of stability, of a secure pair of hands, with just the right amount of added hypocrisy:

‘Although he found it distasteful, he operated according to the principle of “what I don’t know can’t hurt me”. Also known as “discretion”.

That image, that discretion, comes under increasing pressure as Winter pursues his suspicion that the death in a helicopter crash of one of the bank’s best clients, Muhammed Al-Bader, along with Winter’s beautiful deputy, Anne, who’s also the object of his (undeclared) affections, isn’t as accidental as it seems. Enter Fatima, equally beautiful (are there no plain, even overweight ladies in banking and investment?), fluent in English and Arabic, but not German, which makes her and Winter a perfect fit as both heroes and hunters. But it soon becomes clear that there are other hunters out there and out to get them.
‘… The woman smiled: “Mr Kaddour … would be delighted if you would accept his dinner invitation … he will pick you up from the Shepheard at 8:30pm.” Winter smiled … and wondered who’d announced his arrival. He hadn’t told anyone which hotel he was staying in. Clearly he was being followed.’

He is followed and attacked, several times over, as the action moves from the Bernese Oberland to Cairo to the Hardangerfjord and to Boston. At every turn, the story grips and keeps you guessing: who, or what, is under attack, and why? Not so long ago, I might have hinted at the improbability of the dénouement; but, after what happened in Salisbury – a mere half-hour from where I live – I reckon ‘incredible’ has lost its ‘in’: staid, financially strong and stable Swiss banking may claim to be, but there is – according to Peter Beck – pure evil lurking there. And Beck, an economics and business school graduate, clearly knows all about it.

Damnation is the first outing for Tom Winter. The second German title – Korrosion – awaits Jamie Bulloch’s (I hope) superb translation skills. Meanwhile, the tyro Peter Beck is now hailed as ‘Europe’s answer to John Grisham’. Film rights, please?

Max Easterman is a journalist – he spent twenty-five years as a senior broadcaster with the BBC – university lecturer, translator, media trainer with Sounds Right, jazz musician and writer.

Peter Beck studied psychology, philosophy and economics in Bern, Switzerland, where he also gained a doctorate in psychology. He was a cyclist in the Swiss Army, has a black belt in judo and an MBA from Manchester, UK. Today he divides his time between writing thrillers and helping businesses to shape their corporate culture. Damnation is his debut.
‘I believe we should read only books that bite and sting us. If the book we are reading doesn’t wake us with a blow to the skull, why read it? So it can make us happy, as you write?’ Those who share Kafka’s literary views as expressed here may fail to appreciate Alex Capus’ gentle musings on the good life. If, on the other hand, you enjoy a narrative that meanders like the path on the novel’s cover, embracing the eccentric, the humorous and the lackadaisical, then curl up in front of a crackling log fire and prepare to be entertained.

Max and Tina have been married for twenty-five years. When Tina is offered a one-year visiting professorship at the Sorbonne, Max has mixed feelings; although he’s pleased for her, he knows he’s going to miss her during the week and wishes she could just stay put in their quiet Swiss town. He describes himself as ‘an Odysseus in reverse’, with his Penelope going out into the world while he stays at home. The way this novel is framed suggests that Max is about to face new challenges with Tina’s temporary departure.

But this is not the direction the narrative takes. Rather, Max reflects on the life and love they share, and the very many ‘little’ things that make it good. Like Capus, he is a writer and runs a bar. Unlike Capus, he has always lived in the same place, and almost every street in town holds memories. However, new buildings have shot up all around Max’s ‘Sevilla Bar’ and he is frequently approached by developers keen to replace it with something shinier and more lucrative. Max is having none of it:

In a different setting, this sense of rootedness might reflect provincial conservatism. But Max’s Swiss town is actually rather cosmopolitan. The regulars at his bar have names like Vincenzo, Sergio, Ferdinand, Ismail, Toni, Stefan, Suzette and Miguel. It is Miguel, a scion of the Spanish community that founded the ‘Sevilla Bar’, who sets off one of the main strands of the narrative. Short of cash, he asks Max to return ‘Cubanito’, the stuffed bull’s head that has hitherto been on permanent loan. But what is a ‘Sevilla Bar’ without a fighting bull as its mascot? Max’s search for a replacement, ‘Malagueño’ – or should that be ‘Sieglinde Kunz-Gerstenhofer’ from Schleswig-Holstein? – leads to some comical interludes that made me snort. Not like Cubanito or Malagueño, but with laughter.

Life is Good, as digressive and whimsical as Three Men in a Boat, will delight anyone who appreciates gentle irony and an exquisitely well-turned sentence. Alex Capus’ prose, in John Brownjohn’s translation, is a joy to read. This is a book that lends itself to reading out loud, and it would translate very well to radio.

Alex Capus is a French-Swiss novelist who writes in German. Other works that have appeared in English are: Léon and Louise, longlisted for the 2011 German Book Prize, A Matter of Time, Almost Like Spring, A Price to Pay, Sailing by Starlight: In Search of Treasure Island and Robert Louis Stevenson and Skidoo: A Journey Through the Ghost Towns of the American West. Alex Capus is married with five sons and runs a bar called ‘Galicia’.
Hohl (his name means ‘hollow’), is on his first posting to Rwanda as an administrator with the Swiss Agency for Development and Cooperation. He becomes obsessed with a beautiful Rwandan woman, Agathe, who he first encounters in Brussels airport. When he finally finds her again in Kigali they begin a dissolute sexual relationship, indulging in reckless debauchery, ‘like two hungry animals, breathless and out of our minds’.

He recognises, but ignores, the hypocrisy of his aid work. After the Rwandan president’s plane is shot down, mayhem descends and the aid organisations move out. David decides to stay and, after hiding from his colleagues, hunkers down in his agency accommodation. He hopes to rescue Agathe and escape with her to Europe, but she does not want to be saved and David finds himself in the midst of a ferocious slaughter.

The 1994 massacre of Tutsi by members of the Hutu majority government and local militias lasted one hundred days and shocked the world. With a nod to Conrad, Bärfuss suggests that the heart of Rwanda’s darkness actually lies with the European powers who sowed the seeds of, and enabled, the violence. Rwanda was lauded as the ‘Switzerland of Africa’. The Swiss favoured the Hutus over the Tutsi and, together with other international aid agencies, provided development money to a corrupt government, despite being aware of its human rights abuses.

Bärfuss conveys horror in an often oblique fashion. David rescues a buzzard with a broken wing and feeds...
it dead dogs: ‘I was chopping up strong, healthy dogs that had been killed so I could feed a crippled bird.’ Although David acknowledges the paradox, he does not stop. Only when he discovers that the bird is getting fat and sleek on the flesh of corpses outside the garden wall does he react – and does so with unexpected savagery, chopping its head off with a machete.

David is also naïve about the corruption of those nearest to him. Agathe becomes increasingly combative. When David discovers that she is a Hutu militia leader it does little to dispel his ardour. His gardener loots and then slaughters the housekeeper for her bicycle. Inevitably, violence brutalises those living in its midst, and David is infected by the horror all around him; but his response is cowardly and grisly. Bärfuss paints an unflinching portrait of Western influence in Africa and his sympathies are clear. David’s weakness and his failure to act honourably come to represent his nation’s inability to admit mistakes and the irreparable damage of turning a blind eye.

Lukas Bärfuss, born in Thun, Switzerland, is one of the most successful dramatists to emerge in recent years, and his plays are staged all over the world. For his first novel One Hundred Days (‘Hundert Tage’), which was published in Germany in 2008, Bärfuss was awarded the Mara Cassens Prize, the Schiller Prize and the Erich-Maria-Remarque Peace Prize. He was also nominated for the German and Swiss Book Prizes.
Set in the 1990s, against the backdrop of the Yugoslav Wars, this clever and intriguing novel explores the impact of war and celebrates the beauty of language. The protagonist, a young boy named Zoli, adores wordplay and crossword puzzles, and spends most of his time in the garden tending his flowers. When his parents enlist him in the army to toughen him up, Zoli is forced into a brutal new life for which he is wholly unprepared. Melinda Nadj Abonji’s second novel is utterly compelling and unique, her masterful use of language and vivid imagery a treat for any reader.

They say I fell off the motorbike that day just like a sack of potatoes, my father rode on without me, took him ages to notice there was no one behind him, I was lying in the road, fresh bread in my satchel

my father came riding back, I heard him clearly even though I was unconscious, as they all said later, my father came back into my world, which was orange, red, turquoise and purple, there were flowers in every corner and along every border of my world, and these flowers smelled like bread, like the white bread that lay next to me in the dust, and I heard my father calling my name, I heard his voice, it sputtered over the flowers, shook me by the shoulder, Zoli, Zoli! and I sent my papa a plague of locusts, whistling mice that would make his knees knock, I called the neighbour’s dog to come and lick his calves – he hates that so much – there’s nothing I didn’t wish on him to make him leave me in peace

why would he do that? well I’ll tell you, if you’re patient, and of course you are, papa tugged on my earlobes, son, get up, it’s plum dumpling day today, remember? and there was another voice as well as papa’s, and this voice hissed, sent my flowers spinning, your boy is bleeding, look, here, his head! quick, we need to call a doctor!

I must say I knew then where my flowers came from, when the whispering voice said I was bleeding I knew straight away that my flowers were growing out of the blood, yes, out of the bleeding hole in my head, and I swear on my life I’ve never seen such beautiful flowers, they weren’t carnations or roses, nor irises or gerberas, tulips or even begonias, they weren’t flowers at all, they were birds’ heads, oh no, I’m not making this up, I’d have to say they were bunting heads, shaped like flowers, but they weren’t brown, weren’t bland or banal like buntings are, instead, behind my eyelids the buntings gleamed a colour red that exists only in our imaginations, in the shape of flowers but they dragged me from my paradise garden, a garlic-doctor pumped me up with his air, patted me, took my wrist, he lifted my eyelids as though he could see something there in my eyeballs, yes, yes, the warped world, and then they heaved me onto a vehicle, he’s heavier than he looks, they said, all these hands around me, all this sweating from the exertion, just let me lie down, why can no one hear me? so much fuss, they all kept talking at me, leave me alone, I screamed, but no one, no one heard me, and my flower-birds grew smaller and smaller, thinner, and once the red was all washed out again they flew away, because of the raised, crazed voices, they left me behind, and that, that is the reason I cried as I opened my eyes, look, he’s crying, said the doctor, the nurse, and my father’s face appeared above me, son, you’re bawling like a baby, and us? we’re sick with worry, and my father smacked a kiss on my skin, where’s my bread?

they all gawped at me, he’s asking for his bread, listen to him, he wants to know where his bread is

and at that moment, that’s when I jumped up, grabbed the doctor by his coat collar, puked my words on his white righteousness, disturbed his perfectly parted hair with my rage, and I screamed, told them why I’d cried, that because of them, my flowers ... the birds ... and my colours ... and I was lying in the gold dust ...and the doctor’s help, which stinks of money, which he spirits away in his coat pocket ...
and my papa gapes at me, Zoli, is that you, it can’t be you, you’ve never talked like that before, Zoli, what is this devil inside you ...

   the Zoli-devil!
   the dust-devil!
   the gypsy-devil!

-P-L-U-M-D-U-M-P-L-I-N-G-D-A-Y- oh yes, the day we get to eat plum dumplings, usually on a Friday, I love to free the plums from their doughy potato coats, to take the plums, still hot, almost too hot, and make them vanish into my mouth, and I can easily eat seven to ten dumplings, every time.

I know Clemens is sitting in the surveillance room right beneath me, looking at the monitors. A thick wall between us. An above and a below.

I take the photofit out of my trouser pocket and look at it again.

Maybe Clemens still thinks I robbed the bank. Maybe I’m the most obvious suspect. Maybe I was behaving the way people behave when they’re planning a bank robbery. Maybe the holiday came at just the right time for me. Maybe I’ll never be able to speak to Clemens like this again because he’ll only ever remember the photofit and he’ll only ever be thinking about the size of my nose, the distance between my eyes.

I don’t know whether Clemens has understood me. Should I have told him that I took my furniture to a secondhand shop in a town just south of here, that I closed my bank account, cancelled all contracts, made the final rent payment, put the landlady’s key in the letterbox and left? The world is bigger than we think; it’s far looser and more flexible than people usually think. I’d like to tell him that I’ve decided not to stay in one place, not to settle down, not to stick to one career path, not to be part of a single story but to be part of many stories at the same time, if at all.

People fall to earth, wolves are hunted, pits cave in; it’s possible that factories like this could explode, that a hall like mine could be ripped apart, that ships could sink; a poison could make swathes of land uninhabitable, whole villages might have to be moved, islands could sink, towns could be flooded, frontiers erected, fissures could grow. Nothing is certain; not the ground we’re standing on, not the aircraft we board, not the other side of a border.
I’d like to tell him all this but then I think I shouldn’t confuse things by trying to explain myself, that this is just another place to be left behind at some point.

The man in the lighthouse is self-sufficient; he has his telescope and the sky. The people on the poisoned island are self-sufficient; they have their card games, their waiting and their stories. Most self-sufficient of all are the sciapods; when the sun shines too brightly they make their own shade, and for this they need nothing more than their own foot. I’m going to leave the factory. Sooner or later. I’ll pack my Universal General Lexicon and my camera and I’ll find somewhere new.

I use my fingers to measure the distance between the eyes in the photo. The same distance on my own face is also two fingers.

Perhaps the wolf has already crept through the holes in the fence many times. The traps are set for him. None of the leg-hold traps have snapped shut yet.

Nightmare of the Embryos

But that was always it. The search for a lost land. Love. Our fucked-up youth, always exploited, betrayed, bribed, lost. Lies, sadism, the malicious laughter of the ones who were stronger than us. Love, a useless pastime, bad enough having to feed the kids in the home. We were tough by day, our last shreds of humanity torn apart by our boundless anger.

Night then, in sheets that weren’t ours, curled up like embryos, was another world. Dormitories, embryos in beds, craving a womb. A blue night-light (the eye of justice, judging), every breath a meagre measure of affection for the stranger’s embryo beside you. Night: it was hands groping in the dark, moth-like thoughts, dreams cast out into an inhuman emptiness, screaming children’s prayers, ice-cream, icebergs, unconsciousness. Night: it was the children’s great no-man’s-land. We too were lovable. But we didn’t want to live. Night, and it was the matron’s metallic voice. Trembling, we waited for her call, and all the embryos crept back to their own strange beds. Each child was an only child – we weren’t a family!

The nights in these rooms, those cursed nights of unwanted children.

Lucerne 1950. A children’s home at the edge of the woods. Its own large garden, chickens in the backyard, nuns from the Seraphic Love charity. The front steps, a children’s Matterhorn, enormous in my memory, unclimbable. Don’t go down into the street with the people, where children played with balls, where there were parents and strong boys. Don’t go down, danger lurked on the bottom landing. And there it was, a woman who wanted a pretty child, shouting and waving at me in my invisible cage, waving with red fingers, my mother, who wanted a pretty child and stank of alcohol. Her laugh seemed to have slipped to the corners of her mouth and clung on there, just a cold grin. She wanted a doll child, a child to play with. I was ugly and squinted. A nun’s hand gripped my arm, lifted it up. So I waved too, with broken-winged fingers, waved to my mother, who always celebrated Christmas without me, who stood there on the bottom landing, lacking all tenderness.
December 1951. St Nicholas, you good man, they sang, because he loved the well-behaved children. They hung on his red, padded coat and touched his beard. They all laughed. I was a bed-wetter, I was ugly and squinted. I broke the other children’s toys, dive-bombed their sandcastles and tormented chickens in the yard. I stole. And so I spent Christmas Eve in a well-sewn jute sack ‘out in the cold’. The saint’s love was reserved for the others, the ‘dry’ children, the ‘honest’ ones. I could hear the muffled shouts of two hundred joyful children in the decorated hall. I dreamed of mandarins and was filled with hate. Adult footsteps. They stopped by the sack, this lumpy brown sack with the child tied up inside, hesitated, then resolutely moved away. In the hall, at the party, they were eating vanilla pudding and syrup. I was a bed-wetter and I squinted, and they called my mother a drunken slut. She never came again. They called it alcoholic psychosis now and put her away in a sanatorium. It sounded less disreputable, alcoholic psychosis. I had a sick mother now.

Mariella Mehr

Translated by Ruth Martin

Mariella Mehr was born into the nomadic Yenish people and was the victim of a notorious programme run by the Swiss charity Pro Juventute, which systematically removed Yenish children from their parents. Mehr’s major literary work is the Trilogy of Violence. She has received numerous prizes for her works. Words of Resistance is a collection of texts that range from poetry to essays and short stories.

Ruth Martin translates fiction and non-fiction from German, and teaches translation at the University of Kent. Her recent translations include Bettina Stangneth’s Eichmann Before Jerusalem; Hubert Wolf’s The Nuns of Sant’Ambrogio; and selected essays by Hannah Arendt. She helps to run the Emerging Translators Network.
My Brain

Since my birth
More precisely when I was already some years old
My mother had the impression more and more that Something was not right with me
What’s not right then I asked You’re sometimes a bit odd
I am odd
Just look at yourself
But she didn’t want to get into that Until a doctor had examined me
First up a child psychologist
Fine
We drove there
He greeted us
He said
Who’ve we got here then?
I said
We’ve got me here
He found that funny
In short
It promised to be a relaxed appointment
With little jokes between tests
That I had to take
In the course of which it would emerge
That my mother’s worries were unfounded
But things weren’t so simple it transpired
The psychologist wanted even more investigations
For those we had to see a neurologist
Who peered all the way into my skull
At first he too made little jokes
Then increasingly he wrinkled his forehead
At last he said
That something really was amiss
With my halves of brain
I’d only one
The right
No the left
No
I never knew which half of brain was missing
The neurologist said
That in itself was a symptom of this disorder

Meanwhile it appeared
That strictly speaking I had indeed two halves
But one had just remained as tiny as a millet seed
And functionally insignificant
While the second half had expansively encroached
Upon the empty side
Because there was ample room
And over time had overrun everything there
Had founded a kind of cerebral colony
A small world power had arisen in my brain
In the stillness of my early early childhood

My mother had a gift
In no time she could assimilate bad news
As something given
Which it was best to handle without complaint
So she emphasised
That on the whole I was all right
Just my behaviour was a little odd
Then she asked the neurologist
What all this might mean for my future development
Development
He said
And paused
He didn’t want to cause alarm
He had never had a result of this kind before
Never yet heard of such a case
He therefore couldn’t say at all
What it meant for my possible development
But he had outlined my case to a specialist
Who now wanted to examine me
Fine
We got the appointment with another doctor
Then we drove home

In the back seat I looked out of the window
Took turns in covering one eye with my hand then
The other
To establish whether a difference
For the neurologist had explained to me
Each eye was separately linked to the brain hemispheres
Crosswise
And indeed
Through one eye I saw animals in the landscape
That weren’t there through the other
On a mown field stood a tapir
Which wasn’t there however
When I looked through the eye
Belonging to the millet seed
So in that eye I was partially blind
Somewhat later a monitor lizard crawled along the roadside Large birds wheeled above us
And among a few fir trees
That had stood for ages at the edge of the village
An elk was hiding
Do you notice any difference
 Asked my mother
Who was watching me in the rear-view mirror
I said No
And to this day I have never told a soul

The Queen in the Forest

An old man has gathered berries and nuts in the forest in a basket he carries them home through the forest.

When he arrives at the clearing where his house stands, he sees a snake lying in the grass outside the door.

‘What are you doing outside my door, snake?’ he asks it.

The snake replies, ‘I am the queen in the forest and I am waiting for you old man if you try to go into the house I will bite you to death and then eat you if you try to escape then too I will bite you to death and then eat you if you try to stay where you are standing then I will wait until you have starved you will die all by yourself and then I will eat you’

Meanwhile the man has recognised that the snake belongs to a species which is known in the whole region for its deadly and particularly painful bite.

‘I fear your poisonous bite, snake therefore I prefer to sit down where I am on the ground and wait until I have starved but look I still have these berries and nuts in my basket’
what am I supposed to do with them’ ‘Just you eat them’
the snake replies
‘they might make you nice and fat’
‘I don’t think so
I’ve never looked different to the way I look now at my age I will hardly grow fat
but I am still happy to eat the berries and nuts’
the old man takes a handful out of the basket and pushes some of them singly into his mouth with thumb and index finger chewing he turns to the snake
‘If this proves to be my last meal then I would at least like to converse a little tell me
snake
what makes you want to eat me
you have seen
I am old and thin and certainly no treat
the snake raises its head ‘Don’t you see how big I am to sustain such a body
I must take what I can get
if I meet an animal in the forest
I will eat it
if I pass a house in a clearing
I just eat its inhabitants
that’s quite simple’
‘Oh
I understand’
The old man says
‘that’s how you do it
yes
I see that now you’re big huge even
and you’re beautiful at that your scales gleam like precious metals but not as hard on the contrary
they gleam smoothly
it looks to me
as if each one were a single dew-drop reflecting the morning light in colours of green and brown’
the snake twists and turns
it sticks out its tongue
‘Yes
you’ve noticed I’m not just big I’m also beautiful
have you looked at my eyes as well they are as yellow as the inside of a bird’s egg and in between a narrow deep crevice
so dark is the black of my eyes’
the old man opens his eyes wide ‘No
that hadn’t occurred to me yet but you’re right
your eyes are wondrously beautiful and your tongue is beautiful too fine and pointed and split precisely in the middle’ ‘I know
my tongue is beautiful too’
says the snake

‘Recently when I wanted to dive into the lake in the forest for the first time to catch a fish
I saw my reflection and in it I recognised my beauty
I swam to the middle of the lake and curled up there on a lily pad until my tail was elegantly rolled up on it and my head stuck out like a blossom
I called into the forest
‘Look at me
I am the Queen in the forest’
then a bird cheekily twittered from a tall tree ‘what a spectacle you’re making of yourself size and beauty by no means make a queen prove first that you are strong as well’
I swam from the lily pad back to the shore and bit into a fallen tree
my teeth left two deep holes in the wood the bird sailed down from its tree crown to the lowest branch to make sure how deep the holes were
and it admired
how sharply and smoothly the teeth had pierced the wood it had recognised my strength and was willing to believe that I was the queen in the forest then a second bird of the same small precocious species joined the first on the branch and cried ‘Who knows
perhaps this time you just got lucky and the tree is rotten then I slipped back into the clear water and bit into a big stone immediately the stone turned blood red crimson the blood ran down the stone trickled away among the stones and dispersed in the water this made the birds fall silent startled to death they fell from the tree and splashed into the lake
they became my first meal as queen in the forest
now you can imagine my strength imagine
how hard I can bite’
‘That’s a great story
that you tell there’
the old man interrupts the snake
‘but for my meal I want to fetch some bread and cheese from the house without bread and cheese it only tastes half as good to me’
the snake hisses
‘Stop
what are you trying to do
have you forgotten already
if you go into the house
I will bite you to death

That’s a great story
that you tell there’

the old man interrupts the snake
‘but for my meal I want to fetch some bread and cheese from the house without bread and cheese it only tastes half as good to me’

the snake hisses
‘Stop
what are you trying to do
have you forgotten already
if you go into the house
I will bite you to death
you are afraid of my bite after all’
‘No
I haven’t forgotten that you threatened to do that but I don’t believe it any more'
‘Why don’t you believe it any more I advise you not to try’
‘Still
I want to try
I am an old man and I have heard a lot in my life
if I have never heard something before at my age
I can’t resist doubting it a little a snake biting into a stone is something I have never heard of in all my life and it seems very fatuous to me because a snake would break its teeth on a stone or wouldn’t it still
I want to try’

What an Idea

No one in the family has imagination not the mother
none the father
the daughter no imagination
the son no imagination
no one has potential
one lives the life of the family from dawn till dusk
and at night in the beds of the family one succumbs

But one night
the mother haunts the daughters dream it occurs to her that should create herself from strange special lilac material a dratted helmet with an immeasurable point she poses with her lilac helmet amidst the family
who mesh their fingers
so that the mother may climb the mesh intended as a firing mechanism father
son and daughter
with the mother in the middle
bend their knees and arise
so that the mother may lower and lift
they bend their knees and arise
until it is enough and the mother is blasted from the bosom of the family
she dashes out and further out gets through the moon
which she smashes with lilac helmet
leaving a clean hole for the return’s sake rushes further out
unto the dead point
where the light of the sun expires
in the dead point the mother manages to turn around whereupon she gravitates back
she gets back into the light shoots with lilac helmet through the hole in the moon and succumbs in the bosom of the family
The daughter keeps the dream quiet
one lives the life of the family from dawn till dusk
But early one day, the mother wakes the husband the son
the daughter
‘It occurs to me that I should create myself a lilac helmet with an immeasurable point’
the family numbly endures the mother’s preparations
but then she poses with lilac helmet amidst the family who according to her instructions mesh their fingers
so that the mother may climb the mesh
father
son and daughter
with the mother in the middle
bend their knees and arise
so that the mother may lower and lift
they bend their knees and arise
until it is enough and the mother is blasted from the bosom of the family
she dashes out and further out
gets through the moon
which she smashes with lilac helmet
rushes further out
unto the dead point
where the light of the sun expires
‘Darn it
what an idea
what a rush’
she exclaims
although she cannot be heard at home the family sings at the top of their voices and dances in a circle and celebrates the immeasurable potency of its own kin
in the dead point the mother manages to turn around whereupon she gravitates back
she gets back into the light shoots with lilac helmet through the hole in the moon and finally truly succumbs in the bosom of the family who all welcome and congratulate her with the utmost warmth

Michael Fehr
Translated by Shaun Whiteside

Michael Fehr was born in Bern. He studied at the Swiss Institute for Literature, Biel and at the Y Institute, Bern University of the Arts. He has published three books: Kurz vor der Erlösung, Simeliberg and Glanz und Schatten. On the studio album Im Schwarm his stories appear as songs, oscillating between narration and music.

Shaun Whiteside’s latest translations from French, German and Italian, include Black Water Lilies and Time is a Killer by Michel Bussi, The Temptation to be Happy by Lorenzo Marone, Malacqua by Nicola Pugliese, Blitzed by Norman Ohler and To Die in Spring by Ralf Rothmann. He has previously translated works by Nietzsche, Freud, Schnitzler and Musil for Penguin Classics.
You are bringing cake and wine, and meet the wolf.
He unzips his trousers and says:
Reach inside.
He is standing right up against your car window and you pray that he will not guess that a button pressed in your red Ford does not automatically mean that the wolf cannot lead you away from the path.
Finally the key slips into the ignition,
you turn it and start.
But the wolf snarls that you must stay for Grandmother’s sake.
His jaws are so big, he says, all the better to eat her with,
if he can’t have any cake, any wine.
That’s how this marriage begins, for you stay.
And he never quite eats all your cake, drinks all your wine, always puts a bit aside in case of worse times ahead.
It is years before there is someone who teaches you and Grandmother what is needed, secretly of course, after work, at a shooting range
in the woods outside the town.
But when cake and wine are then demanded once more and you absolutely don’t want to serve and to pour, don’t want to lift your skirt and spread your legs, shots are fired.
And if he hadn’t died, he’d live happily ever after.
(Years pass before a well is found, deep enough to let things pass and fade.)
Elfriede Gerstl

In the midst of despair – this is the place in the web where a stitch is missing, where a thread lies not like a blade of grass but like a blade – there in the middle of the publisher’s flat – this is the place where a swastika is scratched into the doorframe just beneath the mezuzah, 4th ring of the city of Vienna – I met Elfriede Gerstl.

I was so young that my word was not of importance. And she found my corpulence strange, she said so herself, what a wee soul I seemed to her, delicate, like a membrane between always seeing and always blind – this from one who was as slight as a leaf, no, as a very sharp blade on which a hair would split almost just from awe at the possibilities, almost just from fear of torture through the possibilities.
How did she get in? I do not know to tell.

Perhaps the window was ajar. And the moth Elfriede Gerstl entered the kitchen like a dream from the heydays of Escada.
What was spoken? Where women once wove. Something about the Lost
Clothes, the book, the one in production. The publisher, she spoke quickly and Gerstl watched me as she did. We were both silent. Never since her has someone said to my eyes that all my life I would play the role of the doll.
That was the stitch of this poet.

Years later when she died, they found trailers of Chanel
and the dreams of Elfriede Gerstl sewn from something special.

WRITING FROM THE MARGINS
BY ALAN ROBINSON

Across the border in France and Germany, Swiss literature often slips below the cultural radar. Although close geographically, Switzerland remains unfamiliar – linguistically and in its cultural tastes and traditions. How do Swiss writers deal with this situation?

One response has been to emphasise national or regional differences, by constructing a cultural identity in opposition to their larger neighbours. Since the late eighteenth century Swiss literature was held to epitomise rural authenticity rather than metropolitan sophistication. Declarations of Swiss distinctiveness culminated in the ‘spiritual national defence’ mandated by the government in December 1938 in order to counter Hitler’s regime. Such isolationist resistance to foreign powers – whether the Habsburgs, the Burgundians, or, more recently, Brussels – has long been integral to Switzerland’s self-concept. Switzerland’s cultural identity is thus indivisible from geopolitical developments. Prior to 1989, there were four German-speaking literatures: Austrian, East German, German Swiss and West German. Subsequently, Germany’s reunification has reinforced its cultural dominance, against which smaller countries must assert their autonomy. A resurgence of local identity, also in reaction to globalisation, is evident in the proliferation of Swiss dialect in broadcasting, music and social media and in the remarkable upsurge in dialect literature, often in spoken-word performances and poetry slams.

Paradoxically, however, the standard Swiss High German used by most Swiss authors has become less regionally marked than in earlier literary generations. This reflects another strategy of ‘provincial’ writers: adapting or even moving, to the cultural metropolis. Many Swiss authors live in Paris or Berlin and aspire to publication by the leading French and German houses. Acquiring prestige or cultural capital plays a role, as does heightened media visibility, better access to marketing and reviewing networks, and hence greater chances of winning literary prizes. Swiss authors published in France or Germany increase their audience not only in those countries but also in Switzerland; those published in Switzerland have less exposure abroad. This tendency towards linguistic and cultural convergence has sometimes been accompanied by heated controversies about whether living in Switzerland constricts artistic creativity.

Underlying these literary interrelations is a wider debate about the nature of Swissness. As in many European countries, nationalistic groups promulgate an ideology of cultural purity, yearning nostalgically for an agrarian, self-sufficient society rooted in an idealised Heimat. This ignores Switzerland’s pivotal position at the heart of European transit routes and cultural flows, its openness to the world as an innovative export nation, and the fact that almost 37% of its inhabitants have a migrant background. To understand the dynamic changes Switzerland and its literatures are undergoing, one therefore needs to consider all the transnational and intercultural relations that characterise the country today. Many bilingual or trilingual inhabitants speak a language at home other than the nation’s four official languages; some of the most interesting contemporary authors, such as Melinda Nadj Abonji or Dana Grigorcea, migrated to Switzerland. Thus, within what internationally is a minority literature, there is a vibrant interplay of minority voices, which Switzerland’s decentralised society is well placed to foster.

Alan Robinson
There is a lot of writing going on in the French-speaking part of Switzerland. More than ever before. Jacques Chessex – the only Swiss writer to be awarded a Prix Goncourt – would hardly believe his eyes. Almost ten years after his death an amazing literary landscape is emerging – it’s almost another literary planet, with more and more women, new voices arising from immigration, authors getting rid of their hang-ups in the pursuit of success, and self-published authors donning full writer’s gear in order to become artists.

One can also meet ‘Easy Jet’ writers, fantasising about being Nicolas Bouvier (the famous Swiss travel writer), and the ‘forever-young’ authors, still performing collective work.

In Biel/Bienne, on the border between the French- and German-speaking regions, a literature and creative writing institute hands out degrees, for better or for worse, depending on your point of view. And literary studies and traditional literary criticism have given way to new bloggers and to private book clubs.

In the French part of Switzerland, you can also observe what is now a global phenomenon: the explosion of social media that allows unknown writers to promote their own books, thus playing the roles which were once the province of publishers and literary agents.

Let’s have a look under the surface of all this activity, beyond the publicity, and examine the books themselves, what they might tell us, what they say about the world.

Seek out French-speaking Swiss writers and I think you’ll be surprised by the diversity of styles and subjects they adopt. They might be close to all-powerful France, and the attraction of Paris might be strong, but most of them follow their own paths.

While it is difficult to find a common thread, they do all live and write in a small, over-populated Swiss region, and echoes of dialects or regional expressions appear here and there in all of their work. Generally, however, little distinguishes their writing from that of their fellows in France; and in this French province of Switzerland, which is not one, Paris remains a reference, even if Swiss-French writers won’t admit it.

The challenge, though, is to be read by French readers. Being published in Switzerland doesn’t help to achieve that goal – the Jura mountains represent more than just a physical barrier. To get their books into a French bookshop, a Swiss writer needs a French literary agent or publisher. In fact, the best way is to be a ... Swiss-German writer. Then you’ll be considered a real Swiss writer. A translation from German to French is an ‘open sesame’ to Parisian fame. I’m joking, sort of ... but it’s not so far from reality.

Another way to access the French market is to write in French in an exotic country, far away from France. Maybe Switzerland is too close?

All this said, I’m actually feeling rather relaxed. Because, thanks to festivals and cultural events, contacts are now easy between readers (and writers) in France, and Swiss-French writers, such as Marius Daniel Popescu, Jean-François Haas, Daniel de Roulet, Anne-Claire Decorvet, Michel Bühler, Amélie Plume, Antoinette Rychner ... But this list is unfair, because it’s not exhaustive. Suffice to say that all the writers – all of us – living in the cantons of Jura, Bern, Neuchâtel, Fribourg, Valais, Vaud and Geneva are witness to the fact that literature in French-speaking Switzerland is alive.

Nicolas Verdan

Nicolas Verdan was born in Vevey of Greek-Swiss parents. He was a prominent journalist before turning to writing fiction full-time. He divides his time between Switzerland and Greece. He has won a number of literary prizes for his previous novels. The Greek Wall is his first work available in English.
The street rises and falls like a wave, surges again, swells, and falls again. These undulations give a sense of the neighbourhood, with its crests and hollows, its gentle slopes. It is a street leading into the city, when this story begins, once upon a time, at two in the morning, on a densely populated hill, on the night of 21 and 22 December 2010, on Irakleous Street, in Neos Kosmos, Athens, Greece.

‘What does a severed head look like?’ wonders Agent Evangelos. He is standing in the street facing the Batman, a bar diminished by everything about itself: the green phosphorescence of its sign, the cheap alcohol it serves and its regulars, all participants in the death of a world, still devoted to the songs of yesteryear, and their youth pinned up on the wall – a photo of Theodorakis, a view of the Acropolis taken from the terrace of the Galaxy (another bar, on the twelfth floor of the Hilton), the faded colours of Greek summers on ads from the 1970s, and the round yellow sun on Olympic Airways posters. Every evening in Athens, the Batman’s customers carry on as if nothing had changed, although so much is dead and gone and despite all the pitfalls that await, the menace outside, beyond the window of the bar, on this street where Agent Evangelos is standing, uncertain about what to do next.

If there hadn’t been that phone call, that conversation with his colleague – with that severed head to blame for it all – this story would have been very different, it wouldn’t have taken the same form, would have been impossible to relate, have had neither head nor tail – ouch! He’d have ordered another drink and sat with his eyes closed listening to Kazantzidis; and if he had waited a little longer he would have been joined by Irena, the owner of the only jazz club in the capital worthy of the name.
When she comes to the Batman, Irina makes her appearance around 1.30, accompanied by a few musicians, an employee and her barman, an entourage drawn along in the turbulent wake of a ferry to the islands. Not for anything in the world would she miss an ‘after’, as she calls it, rolling the ‘r’.

Agent Evangelos likes Irina, her plump figure, her outrageous assertions, her inexhaustible affections, her generous love for the masculine gender – a generosity of being that turns her corpulence into a distinction. It would have been a different story, set here in the Batman, but very soon Agent Evangelos must be on his way. He goes back inside, for he has left his jacket on a hook under the bar. He pays what he owes, and leaves.

‘What does a head severed from the body look like?’ he wonders. A phone call has come; he must leave immediately.

Just a few more minutes and Agent Evangelos might have encountered Irina. That approaching sound of an engine is she; with one finger she manoeuvres the four-by-four, which has just stopped in front of the Batman. The passengers on the rear seat look out; all of them have seen the same things: glimpses of the city, the confused message of the streets, voiceless graffiti on the filmstrip of the walls, the weight of lowered shop blinds, the greenish glow from the forest of balconies, the squashed oranges on the asphalt, flattened candle flames. They have seen all of it go by, but driving along they passed no remark.
What might drive a left-wing intellectual to espouse xenophobic views and defend the indefensible? How might the community around him react? How would you react if he were your father? In Autopsy of a Father, Pascale Kramer poses uncomfortable questions and tests your tolerance of disquiet. She weaves the political with the personal, the topical with the timeless, eschewing a narrative that might proffer facile answers. Her pages brim instead with the realistic contradictions, ambiguities, feelings and thoughts that characters often fail to acknowledge and understand in others and themselves.

The story was inspired by a real-life scandal. In Kramer’s novel, a famous journalist, fifty-eight year old Gabriel, plunges from grace after defending the racially motivated murder of an East African immigrant by two young men. He is sacked, widely shunned, and threatened. When he subsequently commits suicide, his funeral becomes the focus for indignation and threats, and eventually for violence between extremist groups. His thirty-something daughter Ania, from whom he was estranged, visited him shortly before his suicide; after it, her quest for answers draws her deep into a tangle of memories, resentments and realisations.

The picture of a fragmented society, where intolerance and tensions simmer beneath the surface, is not only mirrored by, but experienced through long-lacerated family relationships. The perspective to which the third-person narration gives us most access is Ania’s. The complexity of the society-wide issues at stake is revealed by her shifting views about the individuals in her past and her present.

When Ania was growing up her father was a redoubtable cultural figure and, in her eyes, harshly judgemental of his disappointing daughter. His housekeepers, who cared for her, seemed aloof. But could they and Gabriel have been hurt by her own harsh judgement of them all, made manifest by her demand to go to boarding school and Could her father have suffered more than she realised from the death of his wife, her Iranian mother? ‘You let years go by without a word. You’re the one who can’t love,’ his second wife, Clara, tells her. And what about Ania’s own ex-partner, Novak, the father of her deaf six-year-old son, Theo? Could all the contradictory images she now holds of these people be true? Certainly, every misunderstanding makes the process of understanding others and oneself more difficult; perspectives are distorted and trust is eroded by every misapprehension and hurt.

A poignant example of this is Gabriel’s show of annoyance at Ania and Theo’s long-awaited visit; they haven’t given him any notice, but he’s glad they’ve come: ‘he had simply resigned himself, whatever she might think, to keeping his distance’. Ania dismisses his tenderness when he points to a photo of her four-year-old self and recalls the time they were still close; when he kisses her, saying ‘finally, by your permission’. She thinks his is ‘the seductive tone he had adopted with her ever since she ceased to be pretty’. Their moment together is wrecked by these dynamics.

Autopsy of a Father is a quiet novel with a powerful punch. In a world in which xenophobia, racism, nationalism and extremisms are seeing a frightening resurgence, Kramer’s book points out the difficulties and dangers of ascribing these phenomena to a few clear-cut factors: a simple linear narrative would be seductive but would be more fictional than the complexity the novel hints at, and therefore unhelpful to any attempt to defuse such threats.

The story is moving, though unsentimentally told. Kramer’s prose is sparse, the narrative voice held at just the right distance from the protagonist to convey her sense of isolation and bewilderment. And Robert Bononno’s translation gives a faithful rendition of this writing style.

When we encounter very poetic poetry, do we view it as it was read when it was written? Not just in terms of its era, and not just in terms of its original language (if it’s translated), but in this sense: do we read it through the lens of knowing it isn’t from now?

Even the most beautiful work can seem of the past, of a very specific moment, and it’s very rare indeed that the opposite is true. We encounter classical poems through a lens so thick, it frankly stops many people at the door of poetry. So we might approach this massive, ambitious and admirable volume of Pierre Voélin’s life’s work, translated vividly by John Taylor, with a great appreciation that is perhaps qualified with a temporal footnote. This is often graceful, deeply felt poetry but it seems from a different time. This is a compliment in many ways: people like to read of the past more than they like to read about it. It is axiomatic, of course, that the work comes from another time, but I mean this modally, stylistically, too. Voélin’s work and its like will never be able to be written again. This powerful wadge of poems from a lifetime writing, is maybe the last of its kind. The great twentieth-century poet and his remarkably consistent aesthetic is here in these pages. That is powerful, but the work is also littered with phraseology, vocabulary and gestures that feel perhaps a touch too rich. That said, post-war central European poetics, especially Francophone works, is a battleground on which lyric sensibility and language itself can be reclaimed.

There is perhaps nowhere that this tension is better exemplified than in the work of Pierre Voélin. Maybe it’s because Voélin hasn’t the harshness of some of his more noted contemporaries, or the vivid idiosyncrasy. He is instead controlled, elegant, insightful, cautious, concentrated. This extensive collection of his work in English is therefore, and without doubt, a considerable addition to the English reader’s awareness of a poet who represents more than the aesthetic of the French-language Swiss poetic canon. He is a poet of elliptical gesture, of imagery and patience, and as such his body of work is decisively poetic, in no way formal but also quite consistently pleasing and melancholy. Voélin seems in conversation with poets such as Yves Bonnefoy, André Frénaud, Philippe Jaccottet, Gérard Macé (all French-language poets, all men) but perhaps without the bite or linguistic play that marks the work of Char, Celan or Michaux. Voélin’s work is perhaps subtler, more involved with an active absence, maybe even, in stereotypical fashion, leaning towards Paul Claudel.

Perhaps this is his greatest achievement – to be clearly a poet who can be understood on two levels: one at the very surface, which will please many readers and become something of an inspiration. The other, those patient beyond my own reading, who will be rewarded with a depth that seems to be gestured towards throughout.

Inevitably the works, drawn from eleven collections published between 1976 and 2015, contain within them great multiplicities in terms of the content, Voélin’s concerns evolving as he ages. And yet the book feels uniform. Stylistically, Voélin remains the same. Simple, clear, gestural, empathetic, compassionate, curiously personal, homely even. This, I hope, guarantees the book a readership, as it deserves one.

Light – it has its whips – heron squawks falling and staining the day and no one recognises his day in it

But may you come to hide in this voice
among the flowering trees – the bare boulders and the trunks – the tongue of the lichens
the coal in its hideaway

Towards the alpine pasture – higher up – blind
the shot-off capercaillie’s head
a billhook of blood flying veering over the trails

but may you come back – you – your hands and water for my mouth

You more humble – who used to listen to the word

On this May morning the poem awakes early among the flowers of the chestnut tree

very early – in the other season
the snow guides it into the mountains

where the wind trims our lips again
where our inspiration returns and where I also see your shoulders beneath the frost
the crystals barely grazing you forget that I am this man that you are this woman

and watch at night Orion the Hunter kneeling among the other stars

The lilacs – the hazels – the silver baskets
the maple’s winged seeds raining down covering the paths

the imperfect ivy

and fear – the heart laid bare in the secrecy of the lower branches

Your sisters’ blood – the swan’s whiteness

evening – at prayer
the father’s arms – scratched by the blackberries

There is where the walls rose – and your house

John Taylor has translated books by Jacques Dupin, Philippe Jaccottet, Pierre-Albert Jourdan, José-Flore Tappy, and Louis Calaferte. His latest personal collection is If Night Is Falling, published by The Bitter Oleander Press in 2012. He is also the author of the three-volume essay collection, Paths to Contemporary French Literature and Into the Heart of European Poetry.
Readers not familiar with crime fiction often wrongly assume that the only thing driving such stories forwards is answering the mystery of ‘whodunit’. In reality, good crime fiction can compel the reader to keep turning the pages in a myriad of ways, and the solving of a murder is often tangential to the core of the novel.

Three Drops of Blood and a Cloud of Cocaine is just such a book. The fourth novel from the young Swiss-Canadian author and the first to be translated into English, it demonstrates a refreshing breadth of vision and a willingness to play with genre conventions. There are elements of satire, hefty doses of psychology and philosophy, and even a splash of metafiction in Three Drops..., all set within the framework of a terse, tight plot and combined with some startling characterisation.

The story takes place in Watertown, just outside Boston, and does, in fact, start with a murder. Old Jimmy Henderson is found killed in his pick-up truck, his eyes and cheeks mutilated and his tongue cut out. There appears to be no motivation for the attack, and local sheriff, Paul McCarthy, who knew Henderson, takes the case on with a world-weary shrug at the depravity that surrounds him.

Into the mix steps Franck (no surname is given), a private investigator from New York who happens to be in town on another case and who develops a keen interest in the new crime. Franck is a coke-snorting, blustering sociopath – the yin to the sheriff’s yang. His lack of respect for society’s mores is at the heart of Mouron’s book.

The author uses Franck’s outrageousness to poke satirical fun at Watertown’s population generally, and at the hypocrisy of its chattering classes specifically. Through Franck’s drug-fuelled proclamations about the nature of human existence Mouron raises questions about how society functions and examines the potentially broken links between morality and legality.

As the plot progresses, McCarthy arrests a prime suspect in the case – Alexander Marshall, a low-life drug dealer and violent thug who was living with the deceased’s daughter. But Marshall’s guilt seems too convenient to the sheriff, who seeks more meaning behind the crime. At the same time, Franck’s behaviour becomes ever more erratic and dangerous, and it becomes clear that he and McCarthy are on a collision course.
Mouron has a lot of fun with this double-handed sense of fate. The relationship between McCarthy and Franck owes much to the wonderfully symbiotic relationship between Sheriff Ed Tom Bell and psychotic killer Anton Chigurh in Cormac McCarthy’s No Country for Old Men – so much so that I suspect Mouron’s Sheriff McCarthy is a sneaky acknowledgement of that debt.

Towards the end of the novel, Franck’s proclamations become both metaphysical and metafictional, as he ponders his own motivations and agency, and the startling climax is as cerebral as it is debauched. We do find out whodunit, but by this point it scarcely matters in what is a strange, original and impressive addition to the crime genre.

IN PRAISE OF WEAKNESS by ALEXANDRE JOLLIEN
TRANSLATED BY MICHAEL ESKIN (UPPER WEST SIDE PHILOSOPHERS, INC., 2017)
REVIEWED BY JONATHAN LEVI

Writing a memoir is a challenge. It becomes even more challenging if you are unable to write or type easily, and dictation is hampered by unclear speech.

In late November 1975, Alexandre Jollien was delivered by a midwife in the small town of Sierre, Switzerland. ‘Turning one too many somersaults’ in his mother’s womb, Jolliten got his neck entangled in his umbilical cord. An emergency trip to the hospital, cardiopulmonary resuscitation and ten days in intensive care saved his life but left him with cerebral palsy. ‘You are looking,’ he writes, ‘at the fallout.’

Unable to walk steadily, control his movements or speak intelligibly, he was sent to a nearby institution, where he spent the next seventeen years in the company of a hodgepodge of other boys with a vast spectrum of physical and cognitive challenges. ‘Our motto,’ he writes, ‘was: struggle with and against everything ... in spite of our caregivers’ and teachers’ rigidity! Struggle – against medical diagnostics, discouragement and the other kids’ cruel and hurtful taunts!’

Jollien’s ‘professional horizon’ was ‘rolling cigars’. And yet the camaraderie of struggle gave Jollien the determination, strength and humour to leave the institution. He entered a mainstream high school and eventually the Université de Fribourg, where he studied philosophy, and then Trinity College, Dublin, where he met his wife. A father of three children, he has received several awards from the Académie Française.

Jollien wrote his In Praise of Weakness in 1999 (it has only recently been translated into English by Michael Eskin) in the early flush of his enthusiasm for philosophy. Know thyself, the instruction written at the entrance the Temple at Delphi, became Jollien’s mantra – it was the driving force for Socrates in Plato’s Dialogues. And so, perhaps, it seemed reasonable for Jollien to write his book of self-knowledge in the form of a Platonic dialogue – a friendly chat between himself and Socrates.

It’s a cute device. But Jollien’s interlocutor is more Sigmund than Socrates; an asker of leading questions rather than a questioner of unexamined assumptions. Jollien uses the device as a rhetorical crutch to help him write his story with grace, humour and hope. As a result, the book feels more like self-help than philosophy.

My own hope is that in the twenty years that have passed since the writing of In Praise of Weakness, Jollien has found the courage to throw away this final prop, trust his own thoughts and bracing optimism, and walk free of the shadows of the cave.

Jonathan Levi

Born with cerebral palsy, Alexandre Jollien grew up in a home for the severely disabled. He succeeded in completing secondary education and studied at the Université de Fribourg and later at Trinity College, Dublin. He published his first book – In Praise of Weakness – at the age of twenty-two, and has since established himself as a moral thinker and spiritual teacher.
He arrived muffled up in a woollen coat.

He put his suitcase down at my feet and took off his knitted cap. Western face. Dark eyes. Hair combed to one side. He looked straight through me, without seeing me. With an air of lassitude, he asked me in English if he could stay for a few days while he looked around for something else. I gave him a registration form. He handed me his passport so I could fill in the form for him. Yan Kerrand, 1968, from Granville. A Frenchman. He seemed younger than in the photo, his cheeks less hollow. I held out my pencil for him to sign and he took a pen from his coat. While I was booking him in, he pulled off his gloves, placed them on the counter, scrutinised the dust, the cat figurine on the wall above the computer. I felt compelled, for the first time, to make excuses for myself. I wasn’t responsible for the run-down state of this place. I’d only been working there a month.

There were two buildings. The first housed the reception, kitchen, lounge, and guest rooms in a row, upstairs and down. Orange and green corridors, lit by blueish light bulbs. Old Park hadn’t moved on from the days after the war, when guests were lured like squid to the nets, dazzled by strings of blinking lights. From the boiler room, on clear days, I could see the beach stretching all the way to the Ulsan mountains, ballooning towards the sky like a matronly bosom. The second building was down a few alleyways, a traditional house on stilts updated to make the best of the two rooms with their heated floors and paper dividing walls. An internal courtyard with a frozen fountain, a bare chestnut tree. There was no mention of Old Park’s in the guidebooks. People washed up there by chance, when they’d had too much to drink or missed the last bus.

The computer froze. While it spluttered, I told the Frenchman what he needed to know about the day-to-day running of the hotel. Old Park usually did this. He wasn’t there that day. Breakfast from 5:00 a.m. to 10:00, in the kitchen adjoining the reception, through the sliding glass door. No charge for toast, butter, jam, coffee, tea, orange juice and milk. Fruit and yogurt extra, put a thousand won in the basket on top of the toaster. Items to be washed should be left in the machine at the end of the corridor on the ground floor; I’d take care of the laundry. Wifi code: ilovesokcho, all one word, no capitals. Convenience store open twenty-four hours a day, fifty metres down the road. Bus stop on the left just past the shop. Seoraksan National Park, one hour away, open all day until sunset. A good pair of boots recommended, for the snow. Bear in mind that Sokcho was a seaside resort. There wasn’t much to do in the winter.

Guests were few and far between at that time of year. A Japanese climber and a girl of about my age, fleeing from the capital to recover from plastic surgery to her face. She’d been there about two weeks, her boyfriend had just joined her for ten days. I’d put them all in the main house. Since Park’s wife died last year, the hotel had been operating at half strength. Park had cleared out the rooms upstairs. What with my room and Park’s, all the rooms were taken. The Frenchman could sleep in the annexe.

It was dark. We set off down a narrow alleyway past Mother Kim’s stall. Her pork balls gave off an aroma of garlic and drains that lingered in the mouth all the way down the street. Ice cracked beneath our feet. Pallid neon lights. We crossed a second alleyway and came to the front porch.
Kerrand slid the door open. Pink paint, plastic faux baroque mirror, desk, purple bedspread. His head brushed the ceiling, from wall to bed was no more than two steps for him. I’d given him the smallest room, to save on cleaning. The communal bathroom was across the courtyard, but he wouldn’t get wet, there was a covered walkway all around the house. It didn’t bother him anyway. He peered at the blemishes in the wallpaper, put down his case, handed me five thousand won. I tried to refuse it but he insisted, wearily.

What if the World Wide Web were to disappear? This is the secret wish of a few people scattered around the world. The author, herself part of the generation she depicts, plays on her characters’ contradictions. Without ever condemning the WWW or its users, she makes the virtual world real by describing the huge data centres and data flow. Playing with the idea of a world without the internet, she makes it very obvious that this new world will be nothing like the old one.

It lies at the bottom of the ocean. It is motionless, slender, and tubular; gray – or maybe black; it’s hard to tell in the darkness. It looks like what we have in our living rooms, behind the baseboards, between a wall and a lamp, between the socket and the computer’s input connection. It’s just a wire, really.

Let’s call it FLIN.

The bottom of the ocean looks like snow, just like when the screens of the old cathode ray-tube TV sets got scrambled. It’s both poetic and organic: crumbled bodies of fish and pulverised detritus from the whole wide world fall from the surface.

In the pitch blackness of the ocean depths, it takes these graceful flakes six months to sink towards the wire; but the analogy with the snow breaks down here, because they neither cover it nor make up fluff.

It all began with a bathyscaphe. This submarine, designed for great depths, was meant to cross the Atlantic Ocean and find the perfect path for FLIN’s long body – 7,000 kilometres, no less – to reach the coasts of America from the beaches of Brittany, free of any obstacle, abyssal canyon, or submarine volcano. Still, the mid-Atlantic ridge, like a backbone crossing the Atlantic from north to south, bonding both continental plates, had to be crossed. It was a mere logical need. FLIN would be discreet, ever so deep, slim, and peaceful, but it would reunite what had been separated: two continents which an ocean had set apart.

In the vicinity of FLIN dwell the kind of creatures one only sees in a documentary.

The marine snow feeds arthropods, which are wisps of repulsive legs and mix with metre-wide toad crabs and giant marine sea lice, busy feasting upon the body of a sperm whale. It’s actually so challenging to conceive of the death of such an enormous animal that there is really almost no such thing as the body of a sperm whale. This one will take months to decompose, and will long be a part of this ecosystem of the shadows, forcing eels and monkfish to skirt it. Thanks to a vampire from hell – such a devilish red octopus that it looks like a baddie straight out of a Disney movie – the whole scene shines, lit by bioluminescent bacteria at the edge of the octopus’s tentacles, a halo of white light in black waters – 3,000 metres deep.

For decades, sperm whales have been victims of FLIN’s ancestors, the first transatlantic undersea cables to link Europe to America. Was it because cables were less solid then, more loosely tied up to the ocean floor? Did sperm whales mistake them with seaweed or toys? The fact remains that they choked on them, thus terminating their tremendous life expectancy. Which goes to show that the saying ‘the small don’t eat the big’ is utter nonsense.

A young woman, a tour guide on a cruise ship, befriends an elderly couple after they announce politely that they would ‘prefer not to’ go on the luxury cruise their son has booked for them. They’d rather go to see a film. This old-fashioned modesty creates a turning point in the young woman’s life. The couple’s kindness, generosity and appreciation of simple pleasures help her cling on to her own humanity in the face of the demands of modern life.

We’re surrounded by beautiful things, but most of them have been ruined

The air was mild, the light almost tender: it was a beautiful May day. The winding road that led to Monsieur and Madame Rivaz’s house had suffered from the winter cold, and new scars had been added to all the old ones that hadn’t been repaired after the last frost. ‘You will be careful, won’t you?’ Monsieur Rivaz had said on the phone. I’d had to insist that I should come and see them, rather than the other way around. When I’d asked if I could meet them to discuss the complaint their son had made (‘A complaint? But why?’ Monsieur Rivaz had asked. ‘A complaint about what?’) the couple had offered to come to L. themselves. ‘We’ve got plenty of time on our hands, mademoiselle, at our age.’ But I’d refused, saying Dream Water World would be very unhappy if they knew I’d caused customers to be inconvenienced.

‘Well, in that case, you’ll get to have a little look at the mountains,’ Juste Rivaz had said, with amusement in his voice.

I had trouble locating the couple’s house. The village where they lived didn’t seem to have any street names. When we’d talked on the phone, Monsieur Rivaz had handed me over to his wife and she’d told me about various trees and flowers to look out for, to help me find my way: little did she know I couldn’t tell a magnolia from a hydrangea. She mentioned an impressive mirabelle tree – you couldn’t miss it, she said. I had to go online to look up what a mirabelle was and find a picture of one, and I rapidly concluded that I had never eaten a mirabelle, nor set eyes on a mirabelle tree, in my life.
Juste and Hermine were standing side by side waiting for me outside their front door. They weren’t arm in arm this time, but they still seemed somehow to be holding each other up. Inside the house the table was already laid, with a cafetière taking pride of place in the middle. ‘There’s always coffee in this house, day or night,’ Hermine Rivaz informed me, as though she were describing some law of fate. She also offered me a herbal tea, showing me the glass jars filled with dried leaves that I’d assumed were all from the same plant.

‘We grow edelweiss too, but you can’t make tea with that,’ added Juste Rivaz, and I noted with surprise that edelweiss must actually be a real plant. On the table there was also a plaited brioche loaf, fresh and glistening from the oven, and an apple tart more beautiful than anything you might find in a fancy patisserie. I looked from the delicacies on the table to the couple and back again, several times, and I felt like a Mata Hari of the basest kind. I’d driven for almost two hours to get these kind, welcoming people to sign a declaration of liability, just to save Alexis Berg’s skin – the same Alexis Berg who’d called them idiots when I’d spoken to him on the phone the day before. ‘Don’t leave until you’ve got signatures off those two idiots,’ he’d insisted. By getting them to sign the declaration I would be aiding and abetting a travel company which had only seen fit to renew my temporary contract for three short weeks, and which – citing budget constraints – was about to lay off their dedicated employee of twelve years’ standing, my friend Laetitia Lang, because she was suffering from a bad back.

‘Of course it was our decision not to go on the cruise,’ said Juste Rivaz firmly, a hint of indignation in his voice. ‘I can’t understand why they’re giving you grief about it, mademoiselle – after all, it’s up to us whether we want to go on holiday or not!’

‘Our son Jonas is in a bit of a tizzy about it, you know what kids are like, but we’ve told him we’re going to sort everything out,’ added Madame Rivaz.
'Do tuck in,' said Monsieur Rivaz. ‘You’re so pale, anyone would think there'd been no sunshine in the Mediterranean.’
‘Was it pretty, at least?’ asked Hermine.
I said it wasn’t.
They seemed disappointed.
There I stood, eyeing up the dwarfs and, of course, the pretty girl playing Snow White; but what else could I have been other than a fir tree, given that I spokenot a word of German, but ‘only’ Hungarian. My teacher was trying to integrate me into the play, as we would say today, but what about me? I felt humiliated by my costume, embarrassed because I couldn’t say anything, ashamed that all I could do was stand there, for what seemed at the time like an eternity. But what I did realise was that I was not the same as Snow White and the dwarfs. I can’t remember if there were other trees, just that I was a tree, and that this story, which is now almost no more than a jokey little anecdote, is my first memory of feeling excluded, and that, ironically, that sense of exclusion arose from the action of a teacher, who I am sure was trying to achieve the exact opposite.

I’m pretty sure that when I was five years old, I had just one burning desire, and that was to be the same as everyone else. I didn’t have to be Snow White, but if I could at least be a dwarf? Moreover, in no way was I going to be seen in a white blouse with an embroidered collar and sleeves. So I refused to wear traditional folk costume, not just because the other children didn’t wear clothes like that (and I may have realised this already in kindergarten, even though wearing the ‘right’ and ‘wrong’ clothes wasn’t yet a factor in our juvenile rule book), but also because I could see just how much that outfit meant to my parents.

Back then, I could not have put this into words, but even so, I knew... very well that there was hardly any distinction between being cast as a tree and a Hungarian peasant girl: both were the result of an effort to make ‘something’ out of me that I didn’t want to be. Perhaps that was why, when I celebrated my first Fasching carnival in Switzerland, it made me uneasy. So I made up my own costume: I stuffed a huge cushion under a long, red gown, put a crown on my head and disguised myself as an old woman with a feather duster. And when my mother asked me who I was meant to be, I just shrugged.

Later on, questions like ‘where are you from?’ had a similar, alienating effect on me. The question was usually the result of someone seeing my name written down, or when I had to tell someone my surname. That such questions about name or origin are just the beginning of an interrogation was something I learned after reading Elias Canetti’s Crowds and Power – and I often saw the astonishment on people’s faces when I had revealed where I came from: from Yugoslavia?

When I finally began to be more precise about my origins, that I in fact came from the Voivodina, and that this area, which was known as the bread-basket of Serbia, was populated by a whole raft of different ethnic groups, including Serbs, Slovaks, Croats, Ruthenians, Romanians, Bunjevci, Šokci, Sinti, Roma, Germans, Bulgars, as well as Hungarians, which was my family’s nationality; when I uttered the key words ‘Hungary’ and ‘Hungarian mother tongue’, I would see my interlocutor’s expression relax as they recognised my broad cheekbones, assumed there was fire in my blood, talked animatedly about the pusztas – the Hungarian steppe – charmingly but pointedly ignoring the fact that I knew nothing about the pusztas nor indeed about the thermal baths in Budapest, and were deaf to my explanation that the Communist regime in Hungary was hardly comparable to the socialist regime in Yugoslavia.

My point is this: asking someone which country they come from is very often a paternalistic act. The one asking the question is pigeonholing the one answering, assigning them to that country, so that there’s no room for detailed distinctions, complex ideas are simplified, and a trigger word is enough to confirm their preconceptions. If I answered the question ‘where are you from?’ with ‘from Zurich, District 4’, they’d usually laugh and retort, ‘OK, but where do you originally come from?’

Originally I came from a tiny, white house with a loft, an inside courtyard, a henhouse and a pigsty, a dung heap and a garden. My origins are closely and inextricably bound up with my grandmother, and when I went to join my parents in Switzerland, I didn’t leave Serbia or my village, Zenta, I left my grandmother, her house and her way of life. That’s the correct answer to the question as to where I came from originally.

Much of what poetry is about occurs on the border – where the written words meet the white of the page. This may be one of the reasons why so much poetry is written in provincial areas and border regions. Italian-speaking Switzerland – the canton of Ticino and part of Graubünden – once played an important role in connecting and separating the Germanic and Latin, as well as the Catholic and Protestant worlds. In Ticino’s capital, Bellinzona (its folk etymology derives from ‘war zone’), a wall connecting several castles once enclosed the whole valley, to restrict movements from the north.

Poetry is definitely the leading genre in Italian-speaking Switzerland, both in qualitative and quantitative terms. It’s best poets have all operated some sort of connection with other languages and regions; and while that’s probably true of every good poet anywhere, here it is perhaps more obvious, but also more inevitable, probably because it’s an area of just 366,000 inhabitants, with different cultures on each side. So inevitable in fact, that the region seems to define itself according to opposites: very Italian in the other Swiss areas; rather German in Italy, etc. This is in fact a productive condition, in terms of translation (in both the strict and metaphorical senses) and poetry itself.

Bellinzona was home to Giorgio Orelli (1921–2013), a Swiss poet who, like no other, brought the Italian literary tradition into the Ticino landscape, and vice versa. One of the best poets of his generation, Orelli bypassed the more hermetic ‘linea lombarda’, developing a poetry of the object, made of observations, asides and anecdotes, all spun into the most captivating phono-symbolic cobweb. Sitting silently on his sofa, generations of younger poets have journeyed, poem by poem, through world literature, following the particular group of letters that happened to stimulate his ear.
Giorgio’s cousin, Giovanni Orelli (1928–2016), was one of the region’s finest authors, besides being a poet and translator (of Emily Dickinson, in the dark syllabic patois of Valle Bedretto). Other authors we must mention are: Anna Felder (b.1937), Fleur Jaeggy (b.1940), Alberto Nessi (b.1940), Paolo Di Stefano (b.1956), Anna Ruchat (b.1959), Erminio Ferrari (b.1959), Pierre Lepori (b.1968, who writes in both Italian and French), Virginia Helbling (b.1974), Tommaso Soldini (b.1976), Oliver Scharpf (b.1977) and Andrea Fazioli (b.1978). Extracts from some of these you can read in this magazine.

Within our fifty-year timespan, two seminal books were published, both addressing the deep rural misery that Ticino was only just starting to forget: the novel Il fondo del sacco (1970) by Plinio Martini (1923–1979), and the narrative essay Albero Genealogico (1969) by Piero Bianconi (1899–1984), which opens with the striking statement: ‘the distance separating my mother’s childhood from her old age is wider than the distance between her as a child and the cavemen’. That woman, by the way, is my great-great-aunt.

Two special prose writers are Enrico Filippini (1932–1988), who with his work as journalist, publisher, translator and novelist, performed miracles to bring German literature to Italy; and Matteo Terzaghi (b.1970), who in short prose works simultaneously manages to create dialogues with photography, the philosophy of language, magic and Robert Walser.

Now, back to poetry. The writer who follows in Giorgio Orelli’s footsteps, both in terms of inspiring younger writers and of writing outstanding poetry, is Fabio Pusterla (b.1957). His Bocksten is one of the best poetry books written in Italian in the twentieth century. Aside from the strong relationship with the Italian tradition, Pusterla is influenced by poetry in French, particularly that of Swiss poet Philippe Jaccottet, who he translated. Pietro De Marchi (b.1958), even more influenced by Orelli’s poetry than the others, seems to have reached full maturity with his recent book, La carta delle arance (‘The Map of The Oranges’), which won the Gottfried Keller Prize in 2017. De Marchi was born in Italy and moved to Switzerland as an adult, as some of the most interesting younger poets have also done: Fabiano Alborghetti (b.1970), who constantly challenges the most repetitive rhythms while addressing, in his long narrative poems, unsettling social conditions; Massimo Gezzi (b.1976), the sober and full-bodied offspring of the finest Italian tradition; and Laura Accerboni (b.1985), and her short, sharp shards of poems.

I’d like to mention several other poets, but can’t even get close to naming them all: beat poet Franco Beltrametti (1937–1995), Aurelio Buletti (b.1946), Massimo Daviddi (b.1954), Prisca Agustoni (b.1975, who writes in Italian and Portuguese and a few other languages), Elena Jurissevich (b.1976), Pietro

Many other factors, such as time and the important demographic changes created by the most recent migrations to Switzerland, mostly from the Horn of Africa and Syria, will soon add to this list, as did the influxes from Italy and the Balkans. As I have tried to suggest, the literature of this region is strongly informed by its linguistic hospitality.

The latest experiment in this direction is an online magazine called Specimen which I and colleagues just created in Ticino. It publishes texts in every language and alphabet, and translates them into any and every other language. You can find it here: www.specimen.press.

Fleur Jaeggy has been writing concise, unsettling works of fiction for four decades. Her haunting prose is all the more addictive for being doled out in slim portions. The publisher New Directions recently served up a veritable feast with two collections: I am the Brother of XX, a medley of twenty-one bite-sized stories; and Three Possible Lives, delectable distillations of Thomas De Quincey, John Keats, and the regrettably under-recognised French Symbolist Marcel Schwob.

In these two books, Jaeggy’s prose gleams and glints like cut gems. Her sentences are hard as diamond and smooth as glass. They offer the reader little purchase and cold comfort. Excess is ruthlessly cut away, yet her pithy sentences are eminently suggestive in their very brevity.

I am the Brother of XX, translated with exquisite precision by Gini Alhadeff, contains deftly sketched portraits of real and imagined figures. In ‘An Encounter in the Bronx’, the narrator sits in a restaurant with her husband, Roberto Calasso, and their friend Oliver Sacks, but instead of joining the conversation, she communes with a fish that is soon to become someone’s dinner. In ‘The Heir’, a ten-year-old orphan burns down the house of her indulgent adoptive mother: ‘Creation,’ the narrator pithily notes, ‘is a form of destruction.’ Equally grim tales follow. Works of art are gateways between the real and the imagined: nymphs are released from their terra cotta likenesses, to their distress, and people access their dead through photographs and paintings.

Death is an overt presence in all but two of these stories. Jaeggy’s close friend Ingeborg Bachmann appears only twice but can be seen as the collection’s presiding spirit. The subtle influence of Bachmann’s unflinching cycle of novels, Todesarten (‘Ways of Dying’), can be traced through these stories in the frigid light they shed on the psychological and physical violence human beings perpetrate on themselves and on those close to them and themselves.

Three Possible Lives, elegantly translated by Minna Zallman Proctor, bears the somewhat wry subtitle of ‘essays’, for these three portraits are rather exercises in biography-as-kaleidoscope. While these essays follow the general arc of their subjects’ lives – from birth through childhood, adulthood, and death – they advance through a clustering of facts, images, peculiarities, impressions and anecdotes, which seem to shift and refract as they accumulate, offering new perspectives on, and insights into, these writers. The essay on John Keats, for example, opens with the observation that ‘in 1803, the guillotine was a common children’s toy’. Jaeggy then reflects on the possible influence of toys on character, and the metaphysical difference between a tiny guillotine and war, concluding that ‘children are metaphysical creatures, a gift they lose too early, sometimes at the very moment they begin to talk’.

Jaeggy then unexpectedly juxtaposes with this a picture of Keats as a belligerent and combative schoolboy. His metaphysical awakening, we understand all the more forcefully, will come later.

We see Thomas De Quincey taking leave of his youth ‘like a caliph takes leave of his rosebuds’, struggling with dyspepsia, and indulging in laudanum, all the while wrapping ‘his words in smoke, chains, captivity, bondage’. The piece on Marcel Schwob is a masterwork of concision. In less than ten pages, Jaeggy captures the essence of a man known as both the Great Sheik of Knowledge and Grimoires, by the eminent Orientalist Claude Mardrus, and Pookiewooky, by his consumptive working-class lover, Louise.

The foreboding atmosphere that pervades these two books, with their undercurrents of despair and of loss – both experienced and anticipated – along with the omnipresent momento mori, is, however, far from morbid. Paradoxically, this atmosphere, leavened as it is with by subtle gallows humour, imbues these volumes with a sense of lightness and urgency, and sparks a desire to understand more fully the brief time allotted to each of us. Death, after all, both concentrates the mind and is the mother of beauty.

There is something delicate and extremely fragile about Pierre Lepori’s poetry and about the character(s) he creates. The voice he writes in is hushed – you really need to be free of any distractions to tune into it, to adjust to the seemingly plain language and pace, to the language stripped of anything surplus. And only when you do that, do you start experiencing its richness. Occasionally you can taste a small lyrical morsel popping on your tongue (‘Rotting meat of refusal’ or ‘Roots of hatred do not breed children’). Together, the quiet images created by Lepori strengthen each other, to the point at which their power can become almost scalding, transformative, but also dreamy.

Henceforth what was known as rain, was now salt, the smoke rising from the sleepy village, known as chimney-smoke, was in fact the cause of my despair. White bread, clothes carefully tucked away in the closets for the summer months, the mothballs thrown in the sand. Everything was given to us once and for all. But the cry that arose from the stomach would never give birth to speech. and the imagined: nymphs

What I admire about this book is the fact that the painful and traumatic issues discussed are presented without the usual drama (‘There are wounds with no name’), in a way that almost suggests, without justifying them, of course, that they are a regular part of the fabric of life. There is something archetypal about these poems, something grounding, perhaps even something that can help deal with such issues. Which doesn’t mean that the suffering behind those incidents is any less apparent, or that the tragedy is less sizeable. It’s just that it is painted with a more subdued, almost pastel-like technique instead of screaming expressionist colours. It’s almost as if Lepori focuses on the stretches of silence between words being said and things being done, directing our attention to the negative, the reverse of events, as if he believes in silence: ‘Silence is your heart of wind and your childhood home.’ And somehow he allows the private pain to distil over time into non-personal history, into pure archetypes.

That silence of the countryside asleep in the sun, no longer any omission or guilt for not having spoken: instead there will be a fire in which nothing burns, crying for rest.

Pierre Lepori had been writing for years before he decided he was ready to publish, before he felt ready to call himself a poet. And that comes across very strongly in this, his first volume. The reader can almost sense all the work that went into simmering those poems down to their complete and absolute essence. As he says in the note closing the book, his ‘goal – certainly too ambitious – had been to start medicating the language. This is the reason for certain purely descriptive inserts (though not devoid of affection), in a book born as a path towards the re-appropriation of language.’

There is no doubt that he successfully achieves his goal.

The poetry of the Swiss-Italian poet Fabio Pusterla has a distinctively Alpine touch to it; his work feels well suited to the environment of the High Alps, where rugged unforgiving landscapes highlight the fragility and vulnerability of birds and animals struggling to survive. Interactions between nature and humankind feature prominently in Pusterla’s work, and the danger the environment poses is coupled with the much greater threat that environment faces from humanity’s negligence and ignorance.

This is nature poetry a million miles from clichéd depictions of idyllic, flowery fields. Pusterla instead focuses on images of ‘black soil’, ‘viscous oil slicks’ and ‘frost that cleaves tree trunks’. There is a distinctly environmentalist streak running through Pusterla’s poems: they combine a deep appreciation of the tranquillity and contentment that can be found in nature with an underlying anxiety that this serenity is being trampled on by rampant consumerism and carelessness. However, while the poet is sensitive to the endless and often bleak battle waged between humanity and nature, his work is never overly morose or despairing. Throughout the collection are unexpected moments of grace, as described in poems such as the concise ‘On Tiny Wings’, in which mirth and joy still manage to bubble up through murky waters. These instances, when nature’s inherent threat is overshadowed by its undeniable beauty, even if only momentarily, are mirrored by scenes depicting tender memories of childhood and family that appear in the poems taken from Pusterla’s third book, Things With No Past (1994).

It is precisely this mixture of contrasts – of light and dark, of harshness and tenderness – that makes Pusterla’s poetry so resonant. One poem that for me is a particularly powerful example of this juxtaposition is ‘First Strawberries’. A wistful memory of a little girl pretending to climb her own miniature Mount Everest in a meadow full of daisies, enchanted by the wonder of nature, is conjured up when the speaker hears a radio report of a little girl crushed by a tank in Gaza. This pairing of violence and innocence leaves a profound impression on the reader and leads us to reflect, with a great deal of alarm, on the destructive world our children may one day have to face.

Simon Knight skilfully translates the Italian text into English, and his work, securing from Pusterla a lucid understanding of the circumstances that inspired his poetry, is evident; for even in ‘the more difficult passages’ – as Knight refers to them in his preface to the book – the sense of earnestness and urgency still shines through. The introduction by Alan Brownjohn also provides enlightening commentary on Pusterla’s poetry and further enhances the reader’s experience of his work.

Ultimately the collection ends on a hopeful note, with the extended satire Stories of the Armadillo, which explores the importance of resistance and persistence in the face of adversity, the armadillo coming to symbolise a kind of undeterred rebellion as he marches on, never becoming panicked or losing courage.

Elvira Dones leads the reader into a world unknown to many, yet real. Set in the 1990s and early 2000s, Sworn Virgin tells the story of Hana, a university student from the northern mountains of Albania. In this region a woman is not permitted to live alone, and Hanna can only escape marriage through a tradition by which she becomes a ‘sworn virgin’ – making an oath to remain a virgin and ‘become’ a man – a decision, the novel suggests, is reinforced by Hana’s experience of an attempted rape while travelling alone. The novel thus engages with the Kanun, an ancient Albanian legal code established in the fifteenth century, which survived until the late twentieth century.

Hana becomes Mark and lives a man's life. Living on his own, Mark cuts his hair, dresses like a man, owns a shotgun, smokes and meets with the other men of the village.

Dones' book makes clever use of the Kanun, a specific Eastern Europe tradition, to raise questions about sex, sexuality and gender in both the West and the East. Leaving Albania, Mark decides to move to the US, where he has a cousin, Jonida, who is a wife and a mother. Jonida's mission is to turn Mark, now thirty-four, back into a woman. Issues of sexuality, gender and identity are therefore explored within the frame of a question Mark urgently feels he must answer: what does it mean to be normal? Through Jonida the novel questions the accepted versions of sex and gender in the USA. All Jonida wants is for Mark to turn, not into Hana, but into ‘a normal woman as soon as possible’, because Mark wants a job and ‘all [employers] want is employees who are as normal as possible’. Mark finds he has flown from a structured society, in which women lack freedom, to another one in which the sense of freedom is overshadowed by notions of normality: ‘all she has to do is turn into a woman, for real [...] All she has to do is get a job and a room of her own. All she has to do is to be normal. All she has to do is forget’. Hana might not wish to have a room of her own, as Virginia Woolf did, but no one really cares: she must conform to Western standards.
The novel is therefore critical of both societies. And it is also extremely differentiated and subtle in the way it approaches Mark’s transition back into Hana. The Hana he once was is lying, somewhere deep down in the depths of the body; the process of bringing her back to the surface turns out to be pleasing for Mark, as Hana contemplates the possibility of living without conforming to her cousin’s normality. In the US, Hana can read and write poetry, take decisions and smoke without forgetting who she has been.

Enjoy the rest of your trip

The insurance broker in the town in German-speaking Switzerland that I moved to decades ago retired when he reached that age. I sometimes meet him walking his dog by the river, wearing overalls and a balaclava or a little beret, and I wonder whether he might be too engrossed in his walk to recognise me.

I always hear the hint of a greeting through his panting breaths, an obligatory beginning perhaps concluded beyond my footsteps, and I bet that regular opening each time we meet does not mean the old Folgendes of the greetings he delivered in his working life. Folgendes – ‘what follows’ – is what he would peremptorily announce on the telephone, Folgendes standing in for surname and hello, Folgendes – ‘what follows, let’s get to the point’ – immediately itemising, point by point, the particulars of the insurance policy.

At home he was known as Folgendes: Mr Folgendes rang, they would tell me when I got home, and the day paused for a moment, it stiffened, shivering, in the examination of conscience that Folgendes demanded, in the paragraphs, the risk assessments and the disasters which befall everyone sooner or later, me yesterday by the river, you today in the street.

If Mr Folgendes knew that in the other town by the lake where I was born, in that town in Italian-speaking Switzerland, to which I return at varying intervals to realise that I am at home as soon as I step into the street, in that greeting caught in mid-air, if my dog-walking Folgendes knew that a double of his, an accomplice or a colleague is also getting to the point down there, repeating and multiplying it in the byways of the town centre, walking, walking in our footsteps on behalf of everyone: this other one without a dog, in an overcoat and scarf or in a dark suit, he too a tireless master of the lake, of the lakeside walk and of Paradiso; never in a hurry, but not idling either, with a flat briefcase under his arm or a newspaper or even a baguette. Tall, chest and belly carried prominently, the head always held high to keep the glasses in place, it looks as if he can only see a great distance away, very far off on the horizon, misfortunes and catastrophes as far as the eye can see, folgendes, folgendes beyond the traffic lights, beyond Campione and the border.

And in fact as soon as I pass him, having freshly arrived from the other side of the Gotthard, he is already anticipating my greeting, he is already dismissing me in a few words, looking at my absence, not at all surprised by my presence. ‘Enjoy the rest of your trip’, he says all of a sudden without stopping, without a hello or any kind of preamble, ‘enjoy the rest of your trip’, as he used to stay to my father and mother when they were still alive.

‘Enjoy the rest of your trip’, he says again when he bumps into me two hours later or even two years later, thus discounting the possibility, forever each time, that my next return or my next departure will ever occur.

But I’m not mad. I have my moments of derangement. And I’m Swiss, in the sense that I was born in the Mendrisio area, Genesterrio to be precise, opposite where the priest lived, on the other side of the street. I could see his house clearly from my window, stone-built with green shutters and a front door that had a medieval look about it. If I concentrate, I can hear the scraping of horses’ hoofs, the giggles of the ladies, the odour of their handkerchiefs rubbed over their private parts and thrown at the feet of that night’s favoured one. Of my father I have no memories. They tell me he lived with us, for a few months. In the attic there are some photographs of him as young man, wearing flared trousers, owlish glasses, a pullover the colour of clotted-blood overrun with the first layer of pus. He was smoking a pipe in the company of my mother, who had him by the ankle, grasping him as if he were the forbidden apple. But for many years I didn’t know I had a father. Or rather, I thought my dad was Don Enrico, whom I’d got used to calling father. In fact I also thought he was my mother’s dad, because she called him father, too. But then, when I was twelve, my maternal grandparents came from Zurich on a visit, and then I understood. It was because at home we never spoke of the grandparents. My father’s parents were dead; mother’s angry. With mother, because she had given herself to my father. In the end, my grandmother got cancer of the womb and, before snuffing it, decided to forgive her. We went out to lunch at a restaurant, the third time I had been to one, and I had spaghetti alla Ernest Hemingway, with strong caciotta cheese and swordfish. They told me mother had been a lively child, maybe excessively so. She would hide under the bed or in the wardrobe when it was time for her nap. She didn’t play with dolls. She didn’t pay attention when they read her stories. She didn’t clear the table. But she smoked cigarettes on the sly. Mary Longs filched from grandmother’s packet.
There was a well-known book of science experiments for kids with a chapter titled ‘Every Eye Has a Blind Spot’. It opened with a horizontal black rectangle framing two illustrations: one looked like a faraway full moon; the other was the head of a little girl. Like the moon, the girl’s head seemed to float in the night sky, and even though she was beheaded – or rather disembodied – she looked happy and beamed a mischievous smile.

The caption told readers to cover their left eye, stare at the moon with their right eye, and slowly lean toward the page. It said the little girl would disappear, and that’s exactly what happened: she disappeared behind a dark veil, only to reappear as soon as you backed off.

The book went on to say that, if you stood twenty-something yards away from someone, you could make the entire person disappear, even a grown-up, and that it was due to the head of the optic nerve. This spot – the optic disc – can’t detect light.

At first I thought the magic of this exercise lay entirely in the possibility of making things and people disappear (an astronaut, I thought, could make the entire Earth disappear). But then I realised that the really inexplicable part was that these objects and people – especially the girl in the black rectangle, on whom I’d developed a bit of a crush – reappeared or simply appeared to the viewer’s sense of sight, complete in their own recognisable forms.

The ‘seeing spots’ struck me as even more remarkable than the ‘blind spots’. When I thought about animals that had no eyes, I felt sorry for them, and then I also felt sorry for trees and stones.

‘It’s Saint Bartholomew today, and Saint Roch tomorrow.’ I opened the glass door still in my nightgown and barefoot, it’s very hot these days, even here, in this old house just a few hundred metres from the lake. A scorching end of August, oddly so, after a cool and rainy month of July, but he is wearing a thick, heavy woollen jacket almost down to his knees, and blue corduroy trousers, socks and closed-toe shoes. He is still as tall as in the past, but bent over and much thinner after the operation on his heart. His clothes drop loosely on him.

‘It’s Saint Bartholomew today, and Saint Roch tomorrow.’ It’s eight o’clock, and he must have already been by earlier this morning, because on the door handle, when I came into the kitchen half an hour ago, there was a yellow flower, like the ones that grow spontaneously along the footpath. Thank goodness, this means that today he hasn’t picked anything in the vegetable garden, where he often steals an iris or a daffodil or an orange reed, annoying the neighbours who plant them and don’t dare complain.

On Saint Bernard’s day he brought me a beautiful sunflower. ‘It’s Saint Bernard today, Pius X tomorrow’. He doesn’t say ‘Saint Pius X’, just ‘Pius X’ and smiles as a partner in crime. He still has really bushy and glowing grey crew cut hair, and even though his wife looks after him just as she did before, when he was a renowned architect and very hard to please as far as low-key stylishness is concerned, he looks run-down and happy, like someone who has come to terms with the world and is even able to master it thanks to the calendar saints.

This madness of his is kind – made up of flowers, fruit and vegetables, of words which had never come out of his mouth before and are now uttered with childish openness. ‘It’s Saint Tecla today’, he seems to have said at the end of September last year, when he bumped into one of the people living in the old house under the arbour, a friend and colleague of his in the old days. ‘Tecla that’s who’s got big tits,’ he added in his dialect with a dreamy look, and then continued his walk, dragging his feet on the grass, with his hands buckled behind his back. Who knows where Tecla’s big tits popped out from, who knows whose faces and bodies the saints’ names bring up from the depths of time.

Yesterday the tallest boy put a stone between his teeth and began to chew. He showed his mother what a mouth can do when pushed to extremes and that a ransacked home is only a ransacked home. Yesterday all the tallest boys made their enemies starve and quickly gathered up their toys. They showed their mothers the order and discipline of the dead. Then they ran to wash their hands and listen to the news in the form of lullabies.
And there you are. Rain digs them and follows steep paths in rivulets, deer trails slope across. If lost, let the curving ones lead you, the unseen, by years of undergrowth. Tread them. Listen, your steps spell syllables, taste them they are brief, berries, nouns. Shout if haunted by a name. Over your shibboleths, lichens grow and turn them into REM but don’t be afraid, it’s only them, the Unspeakable remains so (yet if it stirs within the rock, timbers screech, the pasture strips bare).

From La Carta Delle Arance

by Pietro de Marchi

Orange Papers e con ardente affetto il sole aspetta
Dante, Par., XXIII 8

This tissue paper, multi-coloured, rustling between the fingers that smoothed it, stretched it carefully, especially at the corners, to erect before our eyes a fragile cylinder, a flimsy tower and then to light it at its summit, with a match; and we who had waited intently to see it, this sun of Sicily printed on the paper, lifting off the dish with a slight shrug, then turning into trembling flight –

but the higher it went, the more it burned, and, remaining an instant suspended in the air, look a piece of burnt up sun a fragment of the flaming tower falls back onto the ground: and then, while this confetti of scorched paper still floated about us, and even though no longer hungry I kept asking for another orange to peel, I was begging to do it again, to have another go, this playing with fire.
You traced this simple gesture with your hand:
you raised it to your face,
you stretched it towards my window,
while I was driving: I looked,
and against the hazy morning
light I counted them:
eight, eight mulberries with outspread branches
like the tail of a stuffed peacock, a procession along the line of our gaze, so perfect that for a moment I forgot timetables and connections and I slowed down to comprehend
how one can say of eight trees in a row ‘look, how beautiful!’, as you said,
if they have not decided to be that way,
and everything’s
just a chain of senseless alternation, or whether a gesture of the hand and a smile
are enough to make, out of eight trees in a row, an illusion of redemption.

Romansh is Switzerland’s fourth national language, alongside German, French and Italian. Most of the roughly 60,000 Romansh speakers live in the canton of Graubünden. In Romansh-speaking areas, school classes are taught in Romansh, and the language is part of the high-school and university curriculum. Radio and television programmes are broadcast in Romansh; newspapers and webpages are published in Romansh; and Romansh music, theatre and literature create a lively cultural scene.

Before the sixteenth century, Romansh was mainly a spoken language and culture, expressed in the form of songs, proverbs, poems, legends and myths. This changed with Humanism and the Protestant Reformation, which led to a written form of the language, which was first used for translations of the Bible, and for catechisms or psalms, and which provided a vehicle for sectarian polemics. Early on, several regional written varieties developed, leading to today’s five different written regional traditions, all of which have their own grammars, vocabularies and literature.

While written Romansh was primarily used for religious purposes, it was also used for drafting statutes, legal texts, political verse, patriotic songs, rhymed chronicles, travel descriptions and dramatic forms. It was not until the nineteenth century that Romansh literature began to abandon the fields of religion and politics. The political and cultural pressure felt by all European minority groups during the rise of nationalism spurred a movement devoted to the defence and revival of the Romansh identity. This resulted in the first golden age of Romansh literature in the nineteenth century. The writing of that period consists largely of poetry and short stories praising the language, the mountains, the homeland, and the freedom and strength of the Romansh community. The main aim was to bolster the pride and identity of the Romansh people, and the prestige of their language.

Poems typical of the period include ‘A Farmers Freedom’ by Gion Antoni Huonder, ‘To the Romontsch People’ by Giachen Caspar Muoth and ‘Tamagur Wood’ by Peider Lansel.

In the decades following WWII, Romansh literature enjoyed a second heyday. The growing risk that Romansh would become extinct, despite the increasing legal and cultural acknowledgement of the language, spurred a new generation to write in Romansh, inspired in part by modern literary movements in Europe. The literature of this generation reflects a desire to break through cultural and literary boundaries, and to promote the language and its relevance to native speakers. Romansh authors began to write as chroniclers of their times: their short stories and novels depict the whirlwind of changes brought by the modern world to remote mountain communities. It is also during this time that poets searched for new forms and new modes of expression and embracing modern trends, including surrealism, symbolism, expressionism, subjectivity, intertextuality and metapoetry.

Partial translations of the major works from the sixteenth century up to the 1970s are available in English thanks to two anthologies: The Curly-Horned Cow (by Reto Bezzola, Owen Editions, 1971) and Romontsch (by Douglas Gregor, Oleander Press, 1982). The best-known Romansh work worldwide, however, is the children’s book: A Bell for Ursli by Selina Chönz, illustrated by Romansh artist Alois Carigiet. It was first published in 1945 and became an international bestseller. It has been translated into nine languages, including German, French, English, Dutch, Japanese and Afrikaans.

Since the 1980s, Romansh literature has addressed new topics and questions, such as ecology, individual liberty, gender and sexuality; it eschews idyllic visions and instead voices controversial appreciations of Alpine society and realities. There has also been a marked interest in linguistic experimentation, language hybridisation and spoken word performance. Poetry remains a very productive field in contemporary Romansh literature. A new trend in publishing – an attempt to reach broader audiences – is bi- or multilingual editions (mainly combining Romansh and German) and translations into other languages (mainly German, French and Italian, and occasionally English).

Renowned living Romansh authors, who are both translated and public figures, include: Leo Tuor, Leta Semadeni, Arno Camenisch, Dumenic Andry, Rut Plouda and Jessica Zuan. Dalkey Archive Press publishes English translations of Romansh literature, for example the anthology Modern and Contemporary Swiss Poetry by Luzius Keller, and Donal McLaughlin’s translations of Arno Camenisch’s trilogy: The Alp, Behind the Station and Last Last Orders (included in this magazine).

Rico Franc Valär is Professor of Romansh Literature and Culture at the University of Zurich. He has researched the history, cultural backgrounds and literature of the Romansh language and heritage movement and independence movements of minority Romance languages in Europe.

When first published in 1983, Sterchi’s novel won the prestigious Aspekte prize for the best fictional debut in German-speaking countries. It was acclaimed by reviewers as a remarkable combination of documentary realism, modernist techniques, linguistic energy and moral protest. In the English-speaking world, by contrast, Sterchi’s novel failed to take off. When Michael Hofmann’s translation (then titled Blösch) appeared in October 1988, attention was focused on the Booker shortlist, including Salman Rushdie’s The Satanic Verses. Blösch generated few reviews and was rapidly remaindered by Faber & Faber. Its American release in 1990 as Cow coincided with a major dispute at the publishing house, Pantheon Books. Two unfavourable mainstream reviews appeared to then seal its fate. And that, it seemed, was the end of the story – until this year.

Cow’s timely republication enables this intensely Swiss novel to address seriously today’s global concerns with migration, ecological sustainability and the ethical treatment of animals. The plot follows the intertwined fates of Ambrosio, a Spanish migrant worker, and the lead cow of his employer’s herd, Blösch; both end up in a city abattoir as commodities within an exploitative system of industrial meat production.

Beat Sterchi superbly conveys Ambrosio’s bewilderment as a cultural and linguistic outsider in inward-looking 1960s Innerwald, the setting of the story. It is a society on the cusp of change: traditional farming is being displaced by the technological modernity of milking machines, chemical fertiliser and artificial insemination. In the new, market-driven rationale, feed supplements boost the productivity of ‘large cattle units’, formerly known as cows. The village’s canny farmers embrace capitalist innovations but are socially conservative. Sterchi captures brilliantly the speech rhythms of their Bernese dialect, their ingrained mentalities, and their instinctive xenophobia, which pressurises Ambrosio’s kindly employer into terminating his contract. He is replaced by a machine.

The chapters depicting a day’s labour in the municipal slaughterhouse confront readers relentlessly and unsparingly with the gory routines of killing, disembowelling and dismemberment – cows in the morning, pigs in the afternoon. The narrative has an epic scope: in its exhaustive descriptions of butchery; in the socially representative life histories of the individual workmen; in its variety of stylistic voices; and in its symbolic resonance. Sterchi cites Upton Sinclair’s muckraking exposé of Chicago slaughterhouses, The Jungle, but Cow is less an indictment of industrial malpractices than an unforgettable evocation of archetypal life-and-death struggles among humans and between mankind and other creatures, epitomised by the maltreated but indomitable Blösch.

Ever since Beat Sterchi’s great Bernese forebear, Jeremias Gotthelf, agricultural novels have been important vehicles for social criticism in Switzerland. In depicting the capitalist endpoint of farming, Cow marks the culmination of this genre. Sterchi has subsequently become one of the leading voices in Swiss dialect literature and in ‘spoken word’ performance, notably in the ‘Bern is everywhere’ (‘Bern ist überall’) group, alongside Pedro Lenz and Guy Krljeta. Cow remains his only novel. It is a monumental and unmissable landmark in Swiss literature.

Beat Sterchi is a Swiss author who writes in Standard German and Bernese. He worked as a butcher before moving to Canada then Honduras, where he took a job as an English teacher and published his first poems. He then studied at McGill University in Montréal and worked as a teacher at the Goethe-Institut. He is best known for his 1983 novel Blösch (Cow), which won several awards.
This is the second volume in English of Arno Camenisch’s Alpine trilogy, preceded by The Alp and concluded by Last Last Orders. The trilogy, set in a Grisons / Graubünden valley, has made Camenisch hugely popular, both in his native Switzerland and beyond. The first book in the trilogy he wrote simultaneously in both Swiss German and the regional Romansh. Camenisch continues to write in German and Romansh, but The Alp is the only instance when he produced two versions of the same text. Amazingly, the trilogy was swiftly and well translated into English by Donal McLaughlin for Dalkey Archive Press. Camenisch has since published six more books, still awaiting English translation.

Although set in a remote part of Europe, the stories of the Alpine trilogy have both immediate and universal appeal, and part of their attraction is Camenisch’s ability to preserve in writing a way of life that may well be vanishing, and a minor language that has no great body of literature to preserve it. I grew up in neighbouring Austria, not far from the area Camenisch writes about, and these stories have a special appeal for me. However, no previous familiarity with the area is required to enjoy them, although in my case it definitely influenced how I read them. The specific setting is matched by a vivid mode of oral storytelling, which is colourful, readable, relatable and transnational.

Behind the Station is told from the perspective of two brothers growing up in a village of forty-one inhabitants (possibly forty-two; more explanation would be a spoiler) in the Surselva valley. Related in short, concise paragraphs, the novel conjures up the essence of childhood, when the mundane attains the aura of the mythical, and apparently unimportant characters come into their own. But behind the children’s perspective, and the abundance of hilarity, another story of fragility and loss begins to take shape. Camenisch is a master of... the art of elliptical storytelling: the apparently idyllic village life is governed by strict hierarchies, simultaneously appealing and suffocating.

Camenisch’s books are great reads, but they also lend themselves particularly well to being read out loud; indeed, part of their success is due to Camenisch’s wonderful skills as a performer.

There is, however, another reason why his work is so engaging: his stories, while fixed to a particular location, are anything but parochial; they succeed in immortalising a specific way of life while asking universal questions about belonging and about the need to escape and explore.

Camenisch’s most recent novel Der letzte Schnee (‘The Last Snow’), not yet published in English, also transcends local concerns. In fact, it is best read in the global context of climate change. In the novel, two ski-lift attendants, painted in recognisably Beckettian colours, pass the time waiting for snow, which, in this region, has become ‘rarer than cocaine’.

The Riveter is delighted to be able to present an extract from this startling book below.

Andrea Capovilla is Director of the Ingeborg Bachmann Centre for Austrian Literature and Culture (IBC).

Arno Camenisch, born in Tavanasa in Graubünden, writes in German and Rhaeto-Romansh (Sursilvan). One of Switzerland’s master storytellers, his novels include The Alp, Behind The Station and Last Last Orders. His texts also appeared in Harper’s Magazine as well as in Best European Fiction 2012 published by Dalkey Archive Press.
Ora pro nobis, the old man up in heaven is taking his time this year, michty me, it widna exactly be wrong if it’d snow a bit, says Paul and looks at the sky, but that donkey Saint Peter’s keeping us waiting and his boss has other things to be getting on with. He holds a hand above his eyes, a woolly hat on his head, and stands in front of the ski lift’s wee hut. The sky is blue as steel, the sun is rising. What can you do, there’s been a wee bit at least, just take it as it comes, Georg says and straightens his cap, there’ll be more, but we canna exactly do magic. He’s wearing an old ski jacket and holds a red bucket in his hand. There’s a coating on the ground anyway, so at least it looks like winter, bit of sugar on the mountains, it’s a start, eh? The Almighty’s lost His nerve, says Paul, or do we have to go down on our knees for snow, it’s rarer than cocaine now, it is. Next year we’ll do what the Austrians do, we’ll simply roll the snow up like a rug at the end of the year and stow it in the bunker, and as soon as November’s shoved October off its perch and it gets colder again and you have to wear gloves when you’re out on your knees for snow, it’s rarer than cocaine now, it is. Next year we’ll do what the Austrians do, we’ll simply roll the snow up like a rug at the end of the year and stow it in the bunker, and as soon as November’s shoved October off its perch and it gets colder again and you have to wear gloves when you’re out on the moped, we’ll fetch the old snow out of the depot and roll it out, no one’ll notice if we put down a bit of last year’s snow, who’d even think of it, and it doesn’t say anywhere that it’s not allowed, does it, after all, the Austrians cheat too. Georg puts the red bucket down next to Paul and takes a cigarette out of the pocket of his ski jacket and lights it, hm. And if they catch us, says Paul and looks at the sky, we’ll play deid. Madre mia, that we’d have to live to see this too. Whoops, now the cigarette’s fallen out of my mouth, says Georg and looks down into the snow.

They stand next to the ski lift with their hands in their pockets and look at it, she’s bonnie, eh, says Paul, he looks at Georg, built in 1971, the nag’s got a good while in her yet, she’s already given us loads of pleasure, the bonnie tow. Georg straightens his cap, he’s holding a coffee cup made of glass, do you want a filter coffee too, he asks and turns to Paul. Steam rises from the coffee. His red jacket has the ski lift’s symbol on it. We were the first, we had the world’s very first ski lift here in our district, it all started here, and from here the tow conquered the world like wildfire, we’re at the hub of the world, says Paul and nods. Hm, says Georg and pours himself a coffee, strictly speaking, he says and pulls a face, well, actually it wisna the very first ski lift. He puts sugar in his drink. Ach, what are you saying, says Paul, of course we had the first one in the world, that’d be news to me, we dinna want to start rewriting history at our age, do we? Aye, of course we had the first T-bar lift, says Georg, that’s right, but. But what, says Paul, nae buts, there you are then. Aye, says Georg, but them in Schneckenhof in Germany, back there in the Black Forest, they were almost even earlier. What ‘hof’, asks Paul, in the Black Forest, there’s no been snow there for ages, why should they have a ski lift, I’d like to know, that’s just nonsense. That Mr Winterhalder thought it up, says Georg and takes a sip of coffee, for the spa guests who went there to fix their motors. Paul laughs, for the asthmatics, he says, and looks, hands in his pockets, up the mountainside, that doesna count, that wisna a proper ski lift, that was a rope with a pulley and two lads who worked at it, naebody knows if anyone ever went up this rope, it was more of an elevation aid, which you could use when someone had bronchitis and had coughed out his lungs till they lay on the floor like rags, so they could stand up again. It wisna a proper tow, it was just for their health, health equipment, and it didna even have electricity, you still had to pour water onto it, no, no. Georg shrugs his shoulders and says, hm. Ours was still the first proper tow, says Paul, a T-bar, still the most honest way to get to the top of a mountain, switched on for the first time in Davos in 1934 – at Christmas, as it should be – and since then business has been good in Grisons, and as long as Saint Peter doesna take the powder away from us, it’ll go on for a long while yet, but there you are. Georg stirs his coffee.

It aw started long afore that. Ah kid jist as well make oot but: it aw started that wan evenin, a few days eftr the let me ootae the Joke.

Boot ten in the evenin, it wis. Hawf past, mibbe. An’ see the wind? The wind widda cut right through ye, fuckin freezing it wis. Fog Valley. It November an’ aw. Ma heart wis like a soakin-wet flair-cloth, it wis that heavy.

So ah takes masel intae Cobbles, fancied a wee coffee ah did, wi a guid shot ae schnapps in it.

The dosh they gi’e ye when ye leave the nick ahd awready blown awready, naw that ah kidda tellt ye whit oan.

So there ah wis: fuck aw dosh, desperate furra coffee but, wi schnapps in it, furra bit of company an’ aw, a cunt or two tae talk tae.

Ahm tellin ye, arent ah? Ma pockets wur empty, part fae a few fags, a few coins. Things wur a bit tight like. Tighter than tight, tae be honest. Waitin on money some cunt owed me, ah wis. Try saying that but when yir fresh ootae the nick. Ahm owed a whack o money, jist dont hiv it yet.

Impresses nae cunt, that.

So ah goes intae Cobbles, like ah say, an’ order a coffee wi schnapps.

Regula asks hiv ah the money fur it?

Naw a bad question, ah admit.

Dae me a favour, Regi, ah gi’e it, spare me the patter, bring me o’er the coffee jist an’ we’ll take it fae there.

Total patter-merchant ur whit, she goes – an’ goes an’ fetches it.

Sh’e’s like that, when she comes back: Ah didnae pit it through, an’ she looks at me thon wey – ah dunno whit way, masel. Diffrint, anyhoo, diffrint fae usual, wi a bit mair longin in her eyes, or summit. Ahv nae idea whit like it is fur ither guys, see me but? That kinda thing warms ma heart – toasts ma insides, it dis – a woman like Regi lookin at me like that.

Thanks Regi, love. Ye’ll get yir reward in heaven. The money an’ aw some time.

Gi’e her peace wi that kind patter, she gi’es it next, an’ ahm naw tae start getting used tae it eether, cos if Pesche finds oot she didnae pit it through, aw he’ll break loose so it will. Ah know masel whit like he can be.
She’s brilliant, Regula, ye hiv tae hand it tae her, she looks oot fur us, jist takes it intae her heid naw tae pit summit through, nae cunt’ll know, an’ anyhoo: Pesche, the gaffer’ll be the last wan tae notice. Goalie here, meanwhile, his his coffee an’ that’s aw that matters.

Ahd known furra long time she his a big heart, Regula. That evenin there but, ah started tae like her a loatae other ways too.

It’s strange, that. Dead strange. Yiv known a woman fur years an’ naw thought nuthin of it, an’ suddenly, Christ, suddenly she’s got summit. She his: she’s suddenly got summit that’s got unner yir skin, suddenly ye like her like. Explain that yin tae me! That particular evening, ahd a loatae questions tae answer, tae be honest. Suddenly, but, wan single question, jist, intristit me – an’ that wis: wis there any chance at aw, in this here lifetime, that me an’ Regula kid become an item mibbe?

Regula, love, ah gave it, kin ah ask ye a wee favour? Kid ye slip me a fifty tae Monday? Whit it is is: ahm owed a load ae money, jist hivnae actually got it actually yet. A wee cash-flow problem. Ye ken hoo it is –

She looks at me like that. Then goes like that: so ah hidnae changed at aw in the Joke, eh? Ye widnae think, tae listenta me, ah done nearly a year in there, ah hidnae changed a bit still full o the same auld shite ah wis.

Don’t yet yirstel work up, Regi. Ye dont know whit yir on aboot. Ye know fuck aw aboot me, fuck aw aboot the Joke an’ aw. An’ it’s better that wey, believe me. Ye should coont yir blessins. As fur the dosh: ahm naw begging, certainly naw goney beg fae you, it’s up tae you, eether yiv a fifty or ye hivnae an’ we kin talk aboot summit else. That’s aw there is tae it.

She gave me the fifty: folded it an’ pit in ma breast pocket, wi’oot a word. Ah took her haun, gi’ed the inside ae her arm a wee kiss an’ gave it: see if ye didnae hiv tae go tae work, ahd take ye straight hame so ah wid an’ blow ye away. Ah swear, Regi, ah make ye a happy woman.

She wis like that tae me: ah wis a daft bastard, really wis, an’ she gave a wee laugh again, it really wis. Ah hidnae hid much tae laugh aboot recently, ah really hidnae.

Translated by Donal McLaughlin

Pedro Lenz was born in Langenthal and is famous for his poems, articles and novels written in dialect. He has won numerous poetry slams and prizes, notably for Der Goalie Bin Ig, a novel about a downtrodden ex-con with big dreams. It was translated into Glaswegian dialect as Naw Much of a Talker and made into the Swiss vernacular film I am The Keeper.

Donal McLaughlin is a freelance writer and translator. He was Scottish PEN’s first écrivain sans frontières and a recent recipient of the Robert Louis Stevenson Memorial Award.
Born in Scuol in 1944, Leta Semadeni writes concise, luminous poetry in both German and the Vallader dialect of Romansh. She is equally at home in, and slightly removed from, both languages and publishes almost all her poetry in bilingual editions. Semadeni does not translate her Romansh poems into German, or vice versa, but recreates them in the other language, so that the shifting ground under the reader of both versions seems to give only a small shrug. Indeed, a sense of ambivalent familiarity runs through all of her work. She is an acute observer of the natural world, often discerning kindred souls in the animals around her but resisting the temptation to anthropomorphise them. Animals, like words, open new realms of perception for her. Words are like animals, she has noted, ‘inasmuch as they have their own lives and can be very stubborn’.

Leta Semadeni’s poetry and her novel, Tamangur, have been recognised with a number of awards, including the literary prize of the Canton Graubünden, the Schiller Prize in 2011, and the Swiss Literature Prize in 2016.

Leta Semadeni was born in Scuol, Switzerland and studied languages at the University of Zurich. She taught at several schools in Zurich and Engadin and worked in Latin America, Paris, Zug, Berlin and New York. Since 2005 she has lived and worked as a freelance writer in Lavin. Semadeni has been awarded several prizes for her work, including the 2016 Swiss Literature Prize.
The most sincere compliment you could pay Zurich is to describe it as one of the great bourgeois cities of the world. This might not, of course, seem like a compliment – the word ‘bourgeois’ having become for many, since the outset of the Romantic movement in the early nineteenth century, a significant insult. ‘Hatred of the bourgeois is the beginning of wisdom,’ felt Gustave Flaubert, a standard utterance for a mid-nineteenth century French writer, for whom such disdain was as much a badge of one’s profession as having an affair with an actress and taking a trip to the Orient. According to the Romantic value system, which today still dominates the Western imagination, to be bourgeois is synonymous with labouring under an obsession with money, safety, tradition, cleanliness, family, responsibility, prudishness, and (perhaps) bracing walks in the fresh air. Consequently, for about the last two hundred years, few places in the Western world have been quite as deeply unfashionable as the city of Zurich.

Zurich is exotic. We normally associate the word ‘exotic’ with camels and pyramids. But perhaps anything different and desirable deserves the word. What I find most exotic about the city is how gloriously boring everything is. No one is being killed by random gunshots, the streets are quiet, the parks are tidy, and, as everyone says (though you don’t see people trying), it is generally so clean you could eat your lunch off the pavement.

What most appeals to me about Zurich is the image of what is entailed in leading an ‘ordinary’ life there. To lead an ordinary life in London is generally not an enviable proposition: ‘ordinary’ hospitals, schools, housing estates, or restaurants are nearly always disappointing. There are, of course, great examples, but they are only for the very wealthy. London is not a bourgeois city. It’s a city of the rich and of the poor.

People are happy to be ordinary in Zurich. The desire to be different depends on what it means to be ordinary. There are countries where the communal provision of housing, transport, education, or health care is such that citizens will naturally seek to escape involvement with the group and barricade themselves behind solid walls. The desire for high status is never stronger than when being ordinary entails leading a life that fails to cater to a median need for dignity and comfort.

Then there are communities, far rarer, where the public realm exudes respect in its principles and architecture, and where the need to escape into a private domain is therefore less intense. Citizens will lose some of their ambitions for personal glory when the public spaces and facilities of a city are themselves glorious to behold. Simply being an ordinary citizen can seem like an adequate destiny.

In Switzerland’s largest city, the urge to own a car and avoid sharing a bus or train with strangers loses some of the urgency it may have in Los Angeles or London, thanks to Zurich’s superlative tram network – clean, safe, warm, and edifying in its punctuality and technical prowess. There is little reason to travel alone when, for only a few francs, an efficient, stately tramway will transport one across the city at a level of comfort an emperor would have envied.

This commitment to the ‘exalted ordinary’ continues in architecture. Zurich has very few iconic buildings. The museums and the opera house are sedate. Nothing is flashy. And yet this is a city with some of the best architecture in the world; ordinary buildings have to them a quality and thoughtfulness at the level of design that in other places would be accorded only to the icons. Visitors will notice beautiful detailing in the window tracery and concrete finish of schools and railway stations. There are parking lots that should be winning prizes, and primary-school buildings that display world-beating approaches to the innovative use of timber and brick. For a rent that would buy you a dilapidated one-room box in New York, you can live like a merchant prince in a brand-new apartment building.

Zurich’s distinctive lesson to the world lies in its ability to remind us of how truly imaginative and humane it can be to ask of a city that it be nothing other than boring and bourgeois.

Alain de Botton was born in Zurich and now lives in London. He is a writer of essayistic books on love, travel, architecture and literature that have been best-sellers in thirty countries. Alain also started and helps to run a school in London called The School of Life, dedicated to a new vision of education.
12 Swiss Books is published annually by the Literature and Society Department of Pro Helvetia. The magazine was launched in 2012 as the main promotional tool to raise international awareness of Swiss literature. Each issue focuses on introducing to the public (and publishers) twelve newly published works of literature in German, French, Italian, and, whenever possible, Rhaeto-Romance.

The translation of literature is one of the most important ways of promoting national literature to the outside world – and it is one of the main goals of the Literature and Society Department of Pro Helvetia. Every year, the department chooses twelve of the best and most recently published works of Swiss literature, providing synopses, reviews and sample translations, and recommends a further six books, to present in the magazine. In order to be selected, these twelve books must be of outstanding literary quality. The magazine also aims to balance established and new writers, as well as demonstrating the diversity of Swiss culture.

Twelve native English language translators from Britain are asked to assess the twelve books: they write a review of each book, describing its content and qualities and giving their opinion about why the books are worthy of translation. In addition, they write a sample translation of three to five pages, so that foreign publishers interested in the books can get an impression of the style of the texts in question.

As well as introducing these twelve titles and recommending a further six, the magazine introduces readers to the winners of the annual Swiss Literature Awards and provides useful information about the support opportunities for publishers, translators and agencies, with details of residencies and grants.

Every year 12 Swiss Books includes a topical feature about a mover and shaker in the British literature and translation world, someone who has a keen interest in Swiss writing and international literature. You’ll already be familiar with this special feature as it is the brainchild of your Riveter-in-Chief, Rosie Goldsmith.
Amongst others, Rosie has interviewed the critic Boyd Tonkin, translator Frank Wynne and Swiss-British author Alain de Botton (who also features in this magazine).

Every year, 12 Swiss Books is widely distributed across the world of publishers, translators and literary agents – the magazine’s main target audience. Pro Helvetia also uses the magazine across the year as a calling card for Swiss literature at a variety of key encounters with cultural institutions, book fairs and literary festivals.

The magazine is launched each year at the autumn Frankfurt Book Fair and is also available online: www.12swissbooks.ch

Below is a partial, though fairly thorough, list of modern Swiss poetry and prose published in English translation since 2010. I’ve not included straightforward reprints of earlier translations, and have only included new editions of existing translations if they are substantially re-edited. It is therefore essentially a bibliography of new translations. This puts the emphasis on translation and the seeming increase in translated titles, but it does mean that authors such as Max Frisch or Friedrich Dürrenmatt, many of whose works were translated before 2010, do not have a full listing here, and other Swiss writers without new translations may be absent.

The one exception to this is for translations from Romansh, which are so scant and with none, so far as I can see, published since 2010, that I have simply listed the very few titles, whatever their publication date. Maybe the time is ripe for a funded programme of new translations from Romansh.

I have included authors who were Swiss born but lived mostly outside Switzerland (Blaise Cendrars and Robert Pinget, for example) and also writers (such as Hermann Hesse, or Agota Kristof) who, while not Swiss born, did live many years in Switzerland or took Swiss citizenship.

The majority of the list is of translations from Swiss-German and Swiss-French writers, with fewer Swiss-Italian, and very few, almost no, Romansh. I’ve listed in total 144 titles published since 2010: if this seems surprisingly high, then it represents a healthy interest in translation and a willingness on the part of a few publishers to promote the translation of Swiss literature. Without certain publishers (Dalkey Archive and Seagull Books, for instance; both have dedicated Swiss Lists) this bibliography would be a lot poorer. It would be wonderful to see larger publishers showing a greater interest in Swiss translations and we might hope that committed smaller publishers will not only maintain, but can expand, their interest in new Swiss writers.
